Those languid, tiresome sensations, causing you to feel scarcely able to be on your feet; that constant drain that is taking from your system all its former elasticity; driving the bloom from your cheeks; that continual strain upon your vital forces, rendering you irritable and fretful, can easily be removed by the use of that marvelous remedy, Hop Bitters. DRY TETTER.

For years I was afflicted with Dry Tetter of the most obstinate type. Was treated by many of the best physicians; took quantities of mercury, potash and arsenic, which, instead of curing the Tetter, crippled me up with mineral poison and rheumatism. The Tetter continued to grow worse, and the itching almost made me crazy. In this condition I was induced to take Swift's Specific, and the result was as astonishing as it was gratifying. In a few months the Tetter was entirely well, the Mercurial Poisoning all out of my system, and I was a well man—and due only to Swift's Specific. All like sufferers should take it.

THE MYSTIC'S CHRISTMAS.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

"All hail!" the bells of Christmas rang,
"All hail!" the monks at Christmas sang;
The merry monks who kept with cheer
The gladdest day of all their year.

But still apart, unmoved thereat,
A pious elder brother sat
Silent in his accustomed place
With God's sweet peace upon his face.

"Why sitt'st thou thus?" his brethren cried,
"It is the blessed Christmas tide;
The Christmas lights are all aglow,
The sacred lilies bud and blow.

"Above our heads the joy-bells ring,
Without the happy children sing,
And all good creatures hail the morn
On which the holy Christ was born!

"Rejoice with us; no more rebuke
Our gladness with thy quiet look."
The gray monk answered: "Keep, I pray,
Even as ye list, the Lord's birthday.

"Let heathen Yule fires flicker red
Where thronged refectory feasts are spread;
With mystic play and masque and mime
And wait-song speed the holy time!

"The blindest faith may haply save;
The Lord accepts the things we have;
And reverence, howso'er it strays,
May find at last the shining ways.

"They needs must grop who cannot see,
The blade before the ear must be;
As ye are feeling I have felt,
And where ye dwell I too have dwelt.

"But, now, beyond the things of sense,
Beyond occasions and events,
I know, through God's exceeding grace,
Release from form and time and place.

"I listen, from no mortal tongue,
To hear the songs the angels sung;
And wait within myself to know
The Christmas lilies bud and blow.

"The outward symbols disappear
From him whose inward sight is clear;
And small must be the choice of days
To him who fills them all with praise!

"Keep while you need it, brothers mine,
With honest zeal your Christmas sign,
But judge not him who every morn
Feels in his heart the Lord Christ born!"

THE CHRISTMAS FAIRIES.

St. Nicholas.

Aunt Ruth sat thinking. It was only a week before Christmas, and, as yet, no gift had been decided upon for her pet niece, who lived in a distant city.

It was hard to know what to give Bessie—she seemed so well supplied with everything a little girl could want for comfort or pleasure. She was such a good child, and so unselfish, that she was a general favorite, and her friends, young and old, were always sending her some pretty trinkets, until her own room was a kind of museum of love-tokens; every corner was full, her bureau loaded, the table covered, and the walls adorned; in fact, it had almost become a proverb in the family that "Whatever Bessie wished for always came."

Now she was ten years old, had declared herself tired of Christmas trees and announced that to hang up a stocking for Santa Claus to fill was too childish—she would like to keep Christmas some new way. This was what Aunt Ruth was puzzled over. At last, with a look of relief, she exclaimed: "I have an idea! I know it will please her."

She immediately went to her writing desk, wrote a long letter to Bessie's mama, and folded into it a crisp bank-note.

On Christmas morning Bessie opened her eyes upon a bright silver quarter which lay on her pillow. Beside it was a tiny note. She opened it and read:

"Dear Bessie: I am one of fifteen silver faries which are to appear to-day, with a Christmas greeting from your Aunt Ruth. Take us all together down to some big store to-morrow, and we will turn into whatever small thing you may wish for."

"Oh, how nice!" said Bessie. "What a funny auntie! always doing something different from other people. I don't quite understand what it all means, but I am glad enough of this bit of spending money, for I hadn't one cent left."

And, wide awake, she jumped out of bed and began pulling on her stockings, when, to her surprise and delight, she found a shining piece of silver in the foot of each. Two of Aunt Ruth's fairies had taken possession of her shoes, another faced her in the washbowl, and a wee one was in the box beside her brush and comb.

"These will almost fill my poor, little empty purse," she thought, as she took it from a drawer and touched the spring—but there, right between the red linings, was the biggest fairy that had yet appeared!

Such a merry time as she had dressing that morning! Mamma was called in continually. And how they laughed over every new discovery.

At breakfast, she was served first to a small piece of silver coin; another, just the same size shone in the bottom of the glass of water Bridget brought her. It was really enchanting—quite like the story of Midas she had just been reading, only whatever he touched he turned into gold. She wondered if the chicken, potatoes and rolls would turn into silver when she tasted them; but, no! Although she looked very suspiciously at everything on the table, not another fairy showed itself.

How many times that morning she counted her ten silver fairies, I cannot tell. But what fun she had hunting after the other five up-stairs and down-stairs, from attic to cellar, under rugs; in work-baskets, and every conceivable place! Searching was in vain, however; fairy number eleven did not appear until dinner-time, when it flew out, most unexpectedly, as Bessie was unrolling her napkin, and its silver mate lay temptingly among the nuts when the dessert was brought in.

Bessie spent a happy afternoon sitting in the midst of her many presents, and planning how to spend her little fortune. Some of her fairy pieces should turn into a pair of warm mittens for poor Johnnie Davis; many times it had made her heart ache as she had watched him trying to shovel snow with such red hands. She would carry a basket full of fairy cakes, frosted with pink and white sugar, to old colored Susan (she had overheard her telling the cook that it was many a long day since she had tasted anything nice); she would change her biggest fairy into a pretty doll for that distressed-looking crippled girl who lived around in the alley, and would carry out many other plans of the same sort.

But mamma was calling her to get ready for a walk, and, rather reluctantly, she turned away from her new treasures to put on her wrappings, and felt in the pocket of her cloak for her gloves. They were missing, but there she found a fairy, and another came sticking out from the bow on her hat, in a most comical fashion.

That night at supper, a little cake was placed before Bessie's plate, and fairy fourteen came near being eaten, but peeped into sight just in time to be saved from such a fate. How pleasantly and quickly the evening passed. All the new things had to be looked at and admired over again. There was one more hunt after the fairy that had not made its appearance, it was unsuccessful, however, and bed time that dread of children, came at last. It was strange (for Bessie had ransacked her room five minutes before), but there, quietly resting on the snowy pillow, lay the last of Aunt Ruth's fairies!

While she was undressing, mamma explained all the mysteries of the day by reading her Aunt Ruth's letter, in which full directions had been given. Then she told how papa had changed the paper money into the newest and brightest coins he could find; how busy she had been hiding them, as auntie had suggested, and how successfully she had escaped being caught.

"Well, mamma, it's the merriest Christmas day I ever knew! I like all my presents very much, but I think I have enjoyed my fairies the most. I know what I shall do to-morrow. I have got it all planned. Some other people shall see fairies, too."

And thanking her Heavenly Father for all His good gifts, Bessie tucked the crowded purse under her pillow, lay down, and was soon fast asleep.

Early next morning, with mamma to help and advise, Bessie started out on her pleasant errands of love and the silver fairies disappeared rapidly into all kinds of the oddest-shaped parcels, until Bessie's big basket was full, and her arms, too. Such fun she had distributing her fairy bundles, and such looks and words of gratitude as she received in return! "Why its nicer than my Christmas, mamma," she whispered, as she turned to leave the poor little cripple, whom she had made so happy by giving her the first doll she had ever owned.

So, many sad hearts were made glad that day, and the whole year, by Aunt Ruth's Christmas fairies.

CHINESE EATING HABITS.

Customs of the Mongolian Dinner Table—Mongolian Cooking.

"Have you eaten?" (cho lao fan nina may you?) is as common a greeting among the Chinamen as our "How do you do?" In their opinion he who is able to eat is surely well, happy and all right in every respect. Eating is the most common subject of conversation among them. "How many meals do you have a day?" "How many bowls of rice do you eat in a day?" In answer to such questions the celestials name a larger number of meals than they really have, and when, with their hands they show you the size of their bowls, you must understand that they usually hyperbolize. They often address foreigners such questions as these: "Have you rice in your country?" "How many meals a day do your countrymen eat?" It is a common opinion among Chinamen that foreigners come to China because they have nothing, or not enough, to eat. Chinamen hold that the stomach is the source of intellectual life, and, therefore the more portly a man is the wiser he must be. In their language the sentence "He eats much," is synonymous with "He is a wise man." As the rich eat far more animal food than the poor, who subsist chiefly on vegetables, so the phrase, "Che jou de," meaning those feeding upon meat, is applied to wise, happy and distinguished men, while "Che main de," applied to those feeding on corn, signifies a class of men unhappy, ignorant and oppressed by fate. The Chinese vegetarian's highest ideal of life is to become a meat eater. To treat a guest or a visitor to a meal at any time of the day is considered as a mark of refined politeness. Chinamen eating is the most familiar scene, and it can be witnessed in the streets and yards, as well as in the eating houses, hotels and private houses.

Only Chinamen who have families take their meals at home; the rest eat at hotels. Usually they have two substantial meals a day, in the morning, an hour after they get up, and between three and four o'clock in the afternoon. Well-to-do Chinamen have three or four meals a day. The head of the family gets the best articles of food. Often only the father eats meat, while the rest of the family must be satisfied with rice. In olden times the children although they might be married, were not allowed to sit, eat or talk while their father ate; they served him as servants. Nowadays, even in the Celestial Empire, such veneration for age is gone; it is observed only as a meaningless ceremony in the presence of guests.

Poor families usually get their meals from street venders. These carry provisions along with a small stove on a wheelbarrow. Well-to-do families usually employ cooks. The guild of cooks is very numerous here, and the cooks get their degree and diploma like men of science. A learned Chinese cook can prepare pork and mutton in fifty different styles. All cooks here pocket a certain percentage on the provisions they buy for their masters.

The Celestials use no table-cloth, napkins, knives, forks, spoons, dishes, plates or glass-ware. The European style of eating with knives and forks they criticise as being rather work than pleasure. They do not use a white table cloth, because it reminds them of deep mourning. Instead of napkins they use packages of soft paper, which serve them for handkerchiefs. They throw away the sheets of paper after they have once been used, and scorn Europeans for using the same handkerchief several times. Since 1859, when the Chinese thoroughly made the acquaintance of Europeans, the napkin has come into use among them particularly in Canton, but they have modified its use. In a corner of the napkin they make a hole and hang it from a button on a servant's dress. The servant with the napkin goes from one guest to another, and thus a score of Celestials may use the same napkins. Each guest has a saucer, a pair of sticks (knaytzi), a package of paper and a minute cup with salt sauce. Niether sticks nor saucer are changed during the dinner. Warm tea and warm whiskey are served many times during the dinner.

When a Chinamen gives a formal dinner he invites his guests either personally or by cards. Those who accept the invitation inform the host and send him money, provisions and presents, at the cost of from half a dollar up to hundreds of dollars. The money and presents are entered in a special book, which is carefully prepared for reference. On the appointed day the guests appear, and the host, with numberless ceremonies, receives them and leads them to the tents which are put up in the yard. These contain rows of tables, each table seating eight persons. "The tables of the eight sages," they call them, for, according to tradition, the great Confucius with his disciples used such tables. The Chinese women never dine with the men. For the amusement of the guests they improvise a stage and perform a play in which boys take the female roles. It is considered, however, bad taste to pay much attention to the play.

I must say that the Chinese dinners are very tiresome. No topic of general interest is ever discussed at them. A gastronomist who knows everything about various articles of food commands the most attention. Everybody smokes during the dinner. When the Celestials feel about satisfied they amuse each other with homespun puns or childish pranks, such as guessing whether one of the "eight sages" has an odd or an even number of watermelon seeds. The dinner is crowned by a story or legend narrated by some more or less known orator.

A female cowboy (?) is one of the interesting features in Las Vegas, New Mexico, society. She can throw the lariat and "rope" an animal as well as any of the male experts of that profession.

WHERE HE CAME TO GRIEF.

Story of Gettysburg by a Man Who Talked Too Much.

From the Boston Journal.

"Here's where I came to grief," said a Twelfth Regiment man, as he stood upon Seminary Ridge. "How did it happen?" was asked. "Well," said he, "if you wish I will tell you, but I fear I may be wearisome. I always had the unenviable reputation of talking too much, and on that 1st day of July, 1863, my propensity to be too loquacious came very near ending my career. You see they brought us up to the brow of this hill on the double quick, and we found we had a beautiful chance to get a cross-fire on a brigade of 'Johnnies' that lay down there in the open field. We peppered them awhile, and then our boys began to shout 'Forward!' and 'Charge!' I don't think the order came through the regularly constituted channels. It was a sort of spontaneous and voluntary movement on the part of the men, who were brim full of fight on this occasion. The Colonel and Adjutant both tried to find out 'Who gave that Order?' but all we knew about it was that everybody in the regiment was shouting "Forward!" The advance was inevitable, so our officers placed themselves in our front and away we went like a whirlwind. We had captured and driven in all but about twenty or thirty of the rebs, after a slight resistance, and my propensity to talk was so strong upon me that I couldn't help telling the 'Johnnies' that were hanging behind all about our good treatment of prisoners, etc., and thus I didn't notice when the regiment went back to its old position. When I came to my senses I found I was alone. I concluded I would go back, and so informed them, but they very emphatically ordered me to remain. Now, something had to be done, so I quickly determined to take my chances of instant death rather than perish by the slower methods of disease and starvation, and I informed them in not very elegant terms, modes of expression I do not now use, that they might go straight to a very warm country. Then I ran, and the faster the bullets came the faster I ran, till after awhile a shot from off to my right came, and struck me in the left groin, and down I went. O, you needn't laugh; the bullet struck me in front, I'm happy to say, and I never regretted the decision I made in such a hurry." "What became of you afterward?" was asked. "Well, I lay there, unable to move, till nearly dark, and had a good chance to review the rebel army, as most of it swept over me. Artillery wheels and horses' feet came uncomfortably near, but I escaped death—providentially, it always seemed to me. About sunset the Johnnies carried me back to the Pennsylvania College, but it would make too long a story to tell you all my experiences there. I will only say that from that point, lying near an open door, I could see many of the movements of the rebel army, including the formation and advance of Pickett's division, and could hear the yell of the rebs as they swept forward, and then the glad hurrahs of our boys when the charge was repulsed. There were fifteen of us wounded men at the college—the other 700 were rebs—and we cheered, too, when our boys did, until the rebs threatened to kill us if we didn't stop. I shall never forget the four terrible days I passed there—days of alternate hope and fear—nor the joy I felt on that morning when gray coats went away, and blue coats appeared. But I am getting back into my old habit of talking too much. Please excuse me. I'm apt to forget myself when thinking of those days."

An Eccentric Lord.

The late Lord Kilmorey was over ninety when he died. He had been in the Guards, and "was with Sir John Moore's army in the advance from Salamanca to attach Soult, and in the subsequent disastrous retreat to Corunna," and "had seen as much of travel, sport, and adventure, as much of life in its various phases, good and evil, as any man of his generation." But it was not advisable to dwell upon the earlier part of his career. In later life he had a passion for buying places on the Thames, improving and then selling them. On one occasion, it being necessary for his projected improvement that he should add a scrap of waste land to his property, he at once fenced it in. At night the fence was pulled down.

"He put it up again, and again it laid low, the work of reparation and demolition being repeated several times. At length he devised a plan of his own to meet the case. He wrote at the top of half dozen separate sheets of fools-cap paper, 'Lord Killmorey proposes to give next Christmas to the poor of the parish 200l.' These sheets of paper he distributed about the parish, one sheet at the public house, another at the butcher's, a third at the chemist's and so on at other places of resort. He then proceeded to put up the fence again. That night it was levelled as usual. The next morning he went the round of the places where the foolscap sheets had been lodged, and made the following entry in each: 'To cost of putting up fence pulled down last night, 5l., to be deducted from the above 200l.'"

A disturbance the next night was treated in the same way, and then the fence was allowed to remain, and at Christmas the Earl distributed the 200l. without deduction. Another coveted corner he was unable to obtain, though he tried even more high-handed measures. The piece of land belonged to a laundress, who refused to accept another piece in exchange or double its value in money. So the Earl waited till the laundresses linen was hanging out to dry and the wind blew off his own land towards the drying-ground, and then he lighted a bonfire of green wood and kept the dense smoke blowing upon the linen for many hours. But "the laundress held to her own, and the Earl's quick resentment ere long evaporated with the smoke of his own bonfire." The earl was equally unsuccessful in his attempts to force a charitable institution for female orphans to sell him a certain triangle of land which he coveted. His own property ran close up the entrance gates of the institution, and there he established a marine store, festooned with unsightly vessels in hope to annoy the governors into submission. When he was nearly eighty he had a fall at a wayside railway station and broke two ribs, but he insisted on continuing his journey. At the terminus he refused to leave the carriage, which was shunted on to a siding, and there he remained for more than a week. Some of his friends will remember having visited him in his extemporized hospital. At the author's office, in Lincoln's Inn Fields, the earl one day met another client who was eighty-two and as proud of his age as the earl himself, who was then eighty-five. The solicitor said:

"Let me introduce a gentleman of eighty-five to a gentleman of eighty-two." "Eighty-two, sir!" echoed the earl, slightly raising his hat to Mr. Levien, "I'll run you round the square for a fiver." Some days afterwards Mr. Levien called on the writer again, and remarked slowly and with much solemnity, "I've been thinking a great deal about that bet. I wish I had taken it."—London Athenæum.

FARMERS' COLUMN.

Cooking Recipes.

Eggs will beat much more quickly and better if they are broken on to a warm plate, or dropped into hot water a short time before they are beaten.

FISH BALLS.—Prepare a pint of cold salt fish, after it is freshened and boiled, and chop it fine. For this have not quite a quart of fresh-boiled potatoes, mashed fine, a cupful of broken butter, and two even teaspoonfuls of made mustard with salt to taste. Beat up an egg light and mix with these last-named ingredients, adding a little cream or sweet-milk; then add the chopped fish, mixing all thoroughly together. Make into balls on a floured board, and fry in boiling lard like doughnuts. When uniformly browned, remove from the fat with a skimmer, drain, put on a hot dish and serve. Carefully prepared these fish-balls are exceedingly appetizing and nutritious.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—With milk, buckwheat flour, yeast and salt make a batter; when it is light add a teaspoonful of sugar or molasses to a quart of batter, and fry on a hot griddle. Serve with syrup, which may be made, if necessary of sugar dissolved and boiled down. Part water may be used to make the batter, but if some milk is not used the cakes will not brown nicely.

CHICKEN SALAD.—A nice chicken salad is made as follows: Two large boiled fowls (cold) take two large heads of celery. Having removed all the skin and the fat, cut the meat from the bones into very smalll pieces. Put into a porcelain kettle the gravy from the chicken, one-half pint of vinegar, one-half pint of sweet oil or melted butter, one large tablespoonful of mustard, one small teaspoonful of cayenne peper, one teaspoonful of salt, the yolks of eight eggs beaten and stirred in just before taken off, and one cup of cream stirred in when cold. Mix together and garnish with celery tops.

SOFT GINGER BREAD.—1 cup molasses, shortening size of a duck's egg, 1 cup of butter milk (or in its absence use hot water), tablespoon of ginger, teaspoon of soda, flour to make it about the consistency of sponge cake. Excellent baked in patty pans.

QUEEN'S LOAF.—1 cup of white sugar, butter size of an egg, half a cup of sweet milk, whites of two eggs beaten to stiff froth, teaspoon cream of tartar, half teaspoon soda, 1 1-2 cups of flour. Bake on two jelly tins. Reserve enough of the ginger bread to bake on one jelly tin; add to its spices of all kinds and a few chopped raisins, put between light layers and use freshing of jelly to put them together with.

PLUM PUDDING—Stone one pound raisins, wash and dry one pound currants, one pound beef suet minced, one pound dry bread crumbs, a teaspoonful of ground ginger, one of cinnamon, one of salt, one nutmeg grated, one-quarter pound orange peel minced, and two tablespoonfuls of flour, mix all together; beat four eggs with a tablespoonful of sugar, then add one teacupful of milk and three tablespoons of brandy; add to the other ingredients: mix well; if too stiff add a little more milk; put either in a pudding cloth or mold, and boil four hours, taking care that it does not get off the boil; fill up the pot with boiling water, if it requires it; send to the table very hot with wine or sweet sauce. This quantity will serve 12.

RAISED DOUGHNUTS—Mix together one quart of flour, two cups of sugar, half a teaspoonful of grated nutmeg, a pinch of allspice, a teaspoonful of cinnamon and a teaspoonful of salt. Cream half a cup of butter and put it in, stir half a cup of good strong yeast with a pint of warm sweet milk, and put in with the rest. Of these make a soft dough and let it rise over night. Next day stir in three eggs beaten separately, and a pint of flour with a half teaspoonful of soda mixed with it. Let this dough rise till it is light, then fry in hot fat.

ECONOMICAL FAMILY PUDDING.—Bruise with a wooden spoon through a collander six large or twelve middle sized boiled potatoes; beat four eggs, mix with a pint of good milk, stir in the potatoes 6 ounces of sugar and flavoring; butter a dish, bake half an hour. This receipt is simple and economical, as cold potatoes which may have been kept two or three days till a sufficient quantity is collected, will answer quite well.

Farming Brevities.

Champaign county, Ill., has lost 300 hogs by cholera in thirty days.

Thousands of bushels of corn are rotting in the fields around Hennepin, Ill.

F. E. Cook says: I keep a strict account with my hens, and cleared $60 with them. The greater part of my profit was from the eggs. I had one hundred chicks hatched, but lost many of them by hawks.

It is not so much rich food as frequent change in food that keep stock healthy, and thriving in cold weather. Roots of various kinds, provender, meal, wheat shorts, may follow each other to good advantage, but don't omit salt.

The sorghum crop did very well this fall in many parts of the country, and is producing good returns. In Kansas, Nebraska, parts of Minnesota, &c., the sugar-makers have been busy, and the quality produced of both syrup and sugar was excellent. In some places frost had destroyed the cane, but, upon the whole, the return was generally satisfactory. Mr. Adamson, of Sabetha, Kansas, has invented a process of roasting the cane, which is said to obviate the green scum and sorghum taste, destroy the blades, and make it possible to roll double the amount of cane used by the current process. Year by year favorable progress is making toward producing good sugar from northern canes.

Mr. Jacob Funck, Fairfield, Iowa, suggests that the papers have perhaps given about enough attention to the individuals who "farm by townships," but are not the kind of men who build up the state.

A correspondent of the N. E. Farmer refers to persons who are paying high rates for Jersey cattle, and makes the safe prediction that "unless the price of this kind of stock keeps up a number of years somebody will get stuck."

Of thirty-one specimens of flour examined at the laboratory of the Municipality of Paris only thirteen were pure. A sample from Rotterdam contained 30 per cent. of plaster; another, one-fifth of its weight of barytes. Lead, copper, zinc, sulphate of lime, and chalk are also on the list of adulterants of the degraded "staff of life."

Water Good for Digestion.

As regards the free use of water under some conditions of the digestive organs, it may be said that no agent can prove safer or more salutary. Those who have morbid conditions of the stomach and bowels, which do not so far impair the general vigor to prevent attention being given to the ordinary duties of life, can often use large draughts of water, especially in the morning, with manifest advantage. Obstinate constipation is thereby removed, the normal peristaltic motions of the bowels are restored, and these secretions may be vastly improved. We notice the salutary influence of water-drinking upon many of those who resort to the so-called mineral springs which abound in this country. It is not necessary that these springs should hold abnormal quantities of salts of any kind to effect cures; it is only necessary that the water should be pure. Spring waters that are charged heavily with saline ingredients, like some of those at Saratoga, are positively injurious to nearly or quite all that use them freely. —Boston Journal of Chemistry.

Receipt for Making Sauer-kraut.

As the season is approaching when almost every family—and we may say with considerable certainty every farmer's family—puts up for the winter a tub of sauer-kraut, we offer again our receipt for preparing this excellent and wholesome dish. We regard our way the best so far as our knowledge goes, and no one we are sure, will be disappointed who adopts it. It is this: "In the first place let your 'stand,' holding from half a barrel to a barrel, be thoroughly scalded out; the cutter, the tub and the stamper also well-scalded. Take off all the outer leaves of the cabbages, half them and remove the heart, then proceed with the cutting. Lay some clean leaves at the bottom of the stand, sprinkle with a handful of salt, fill in half a bushel of cut cabbage, stamp gently until the juice just makes its appearance, then add another handful of salt and so on until the stand is full. Cover over with cabbage leaves, place on top a clean board fitting the space pretty well, and on the top of that a stone weighing twelve or fifteen pounds. Stand away in a cool place, and when hard freezing comes on move to the cellar. It will be ready for use in from four to six weeks. The cabbage should be cut tolerably coarse. The Savoy variety makes the best article, but it is only half as productive as the Drumhead and Flat-Dutch.

We will just add that there is no dish more wholesome than well-made sauer-kraut, but it should always be boiled—and well-boiled—with a piece of pickled pork or corned beef.—Germantown Telegraph.

Fertilizers.

A writer in the Home and farm advances a sound theory regarding commercial fertilizers: These fertilizers greatly increase the yield, because they supply the very elements which the soil lacks. But there are other essential elements furnished by the soil which fertilizers do not contain and cannot supply. Now, the increased yield exhausts not merely what is derived from fertilizers, but what was previously in the soil itself. Fertilizers hasten the exhaustion of the soil therefore, because the increased yield which follows their use make heavier drafts on the soil for material they can not furnish. It follows therefore, that animal manures, clover, muck, etc., should always supplement commercial fertilizers, which are good as far as they go, but are utterly unable, as at present constituted, to supply continually all demands of growing crops. Let all demands be met.

Wagon Felloes.

I have a wagon of which, six years ago, the felloes shrunk so that the tires became loose. I gave it a good coat of hot oil, and every year since it has had a coat of oil or paint, sometimes both. The tires are tight yet, and they have not been set for eight or nine years. Many farmers think that as soon as wagon felloes begin to shrink they must go at once to a blacksmith shop and get the tire set. Instead of doing that, which is often a damage to the wheels, causing them to dish, if they will get some linseed oil and heat it boiling hot and give the felloes all the oil they can take it will fill them up to their usual size and tighten to keep them from shrinking, and also to keep out the water. If you do not wish to go to the trouble of mixing paint you can heat and tie a rag to a stick and swab them over as long as they take oil. A brush is more convenient to use, but a swab will answer if you do not wish to buy a brush. It is quite a saving of money to look after the wood-work of farm machinery. Alternate wetting and drying injures and causes the best wood soon to decay and lose its strength unless kept well painted. It pays to keep a little oil on hand to oil fork handles, rakes, neck yokes, whiffletrees, and any of the small tools on the farm that are more or less exposed.

Warm Stables.

We cannot too strongly urge upon our farmers the economy of warm stables in this climate: Besides the comfort to the stock, it is a great saving in hay and other food. Cattle will not eat nearly so much fodder in a good warm stable as they will in a cold one. When wintered in a stable that is frost proof, with the usual allowance of feed, stock will come out in the spring in good condition. On the other hand, it matters not how much fodder and choice food may be given them if wintered out of a good warm shelter, for they are bound to come out in poor condition in the spring. A good man should be merciful to his beasts, and by keeping them in a good warm stable during our long winters he will have the satisfaction of knowing that his dumb brutes will be comfortable and that he is making money by administrating to their comfort.

The Corn Crop.

Reports from the great corn belt of the United States show that the situation as to the condition of the crop is practically unchanged. In Illinois, Indiana and Iowa, corn is reported as soft and unmarketable to an alarming extent; some of it being unfit as food for stock. A large percentage of the corn in these States is still in the field, unharvested, and its utilization is likely to prove difficult. Kansas sends news of a less encouraging character. In the northern counties a considerable portion of the crop is soft. The yield will fall short of expectation. The same also applies to Nebraska. While neither yield nor quality is meeting expectations, there is, however, no serious complaint. The planting of corn in Dakota this year was largely experimental, but the results seem to have been satisfactory and an increased acreage is looked for next year.

A Lawyer's Retort.

President Lincoln was reminded one day, by a visit of a very ugly old man, of an incident that occurred in Indiana when Judge Test was first beginning practice. Mr. Test was slender, with a small head, high forehead, large, projecting teeth, and a slightly distorted nose, yet his countenance lit up so well when speaking that he passed without particular observation. One day, however, a lawyer named Brown had drawn an indictment against a man for gambling, but had forgotten to charge a wagering for money or other valuable articles. Mr. Test who was the gambler's counsel, moved to quash the indictment on the ground that it was "bad on its face." Brown seeing the point, and knowing that he was gone, rose with a waggish look and said: "Mr. Test, if everything is quashed that is bad on its face, what would become of you."

J. W. MACKEY'S MILLIONS.

The Bonanza King's Family Struggles Through Life in Paris.

New York World.

"I wouldn't mind giving you some things that are worth reading if you wouldn't take so devilish much pains to make a fool of me," observed Col. Tom Ochiltree as he toyed with a piece of glassware that lay on the Metropolitan bar. "Why can't you newspaper folks get up a passing acquaintance with the truth?"

"Proceed, colonel," said the subdued man of the World. "You are now talking with the reporter who has charge of the truth department for the greatest daily in New York."

"Well, give it square this time," said the pacified chevalier of Texas, "because there are ladies in the case. While I was abroad it was my pleasure to pass a luxurious two weeks at the summer chateau of Mrs. John W. Mackey, and I want to correct some popular views of Mr. Mackey and let the World's readers understand the superb and lovable qualities of his wife. Some idiots fancy that because John Mackey became suddenly rich he has a great deal of the shoddy in his instincts. It's absurd. I say frankly that there isn't a Hohenzellern or a Hapsburg or any other scion of long-blooded descent who displays more genuine taste and refinement than the Bonanza King. His taste for music is critical and amounts to a passion, and no one could take more profound interest in a work of art. Think he just sits down and lets his dollars roll in, eh? Not at all. His mind is actively at work all the time on business enterprises where he can employ his wealth, and all who have had relations with him testify to his keen foresight. Oh, I don't know how many millions he has. Don't suppose he knows himself. He owns five-eights of the mine, and those who own the balance—Flood, O'Brien and Fair—stopped counting their piles long ago."

"Does Mr. Mackey spend much time in Paris?"

"No, very little. But you can announce that he has a house to stop at when he is there. His Paris residence is opposite the Arc de Triomphe, and is one of the most splendid ones in the gay capital. It is furnished in regal style and filled with the rarest works of art, statuary, pictures, bric-a-brac, articles of vertu, etc. The best examples of Meissonier, Corot, Cabanel, Troyon, Millet and others of the great modern artists are there. Both Meissonier and Cabanel are frequent guests at the house, and Meissonier had a portrait of Mrs. Mackey at the last Salon. Now let me give a picture of Mrs. Mackey's home life.

"Her summer residence is the Chateau de Villebon, a quaint old pile of the Fourteenth century, situated near Palasien, about twenty miles from Paris, and surrounded with immense park estates. Every comfort that money could suggest is found there. Mrs. Mackey is a lady of great refinement, rare culture, and withal a decided beauty. She speaks fluently three languages besides her own. It is hardly worth while to more than mention her charities, which are liberal and modestly bestowed. Struggling artists, especially from America, find in her a devoted and quiet friend. Her right hand never knows what her left hand does. There are three children, two boys and a young lady, who is really in quite delicate health. I see some of the scribblers from Paris have been marrying Miss. Mackey off to some half dozen counts over there. It's all humbug. She has had numerous suitors who would like to trade off a title for some cold American cash, but Miss Mackey, having her mother's good sense, has kept her head level and her heart safe. Society will never have to credit her with any nonsense at all.

"The children are all bright and intelligent, and in this connection I must give an incident that ought to make their mother rank high among the household of America. The other visitors at the chateau this summer were Mrs. Hungeford the mother; and the Countess Telfener, the sister of Mrs. Mackey, and a jolly time we had of it till the boys were taken down with the measles. That ended Mrs. Mackey. She dropped everything and played Florence Nighingale in the most devoted manner night and day until the young gentlemen were out of the woods. It may be an old foggy notion, but it struck me that some ladies with half Mrs. Mackey's ducats would have bought a nurse for the occasion instead of allowing a little thing like measles to interrupt their social programme.

"Altogether that household at Villebon was the most charming and homelike I ever saw. Mrs. Mackey is a devout Catholic, and keeps her purse-string open for the church. When they got up a benefit for the sufferers by the Ischia disaster she was asked to buy some tickets. Her reply was a quiet check for 3,000 francs. She gives away a fortune every year."

"How does Minister Morton live?"

"His Paris residence," replied the Colonel, "is located on the Place des Etats Unis (named in honor of our country), and is a very grand establishment. He entertains quite royally; not even Lord Lyons or the Duke Fernan-Nunez, the Spanish Envoy, outdoing him in the splendor of his balls and dinners. The chateau of the Duchess Bujaucon, near Noissy, was occupied by him during the summer, and he did the honors there to many of his American friends, as well as on the famous journey to the inauguration of the Layfayette statue, where a half dozen of us accompanied him on the whole tour.

"Mr. Lowell, too, is holding up his end in London. He is not a man of wealth and makes no far-reaching social pretensions, but, for all that, he is a prime favorite in the best English society, and his modest and cozy little dinners are all the rage. In fact, his presence at the tables of the haut ton is almost fought for."

Cost of Parisian Amusements.

Paris Letter: There are twenty odd respectable places of amusement here in Paris where the yearly receipts amount to at least $40,000. There are about ten of them where the receipts average more than $250,000. The receipts of the Grand Opera were last year about $650,000 and this does not include the $180,000 annual subvention from the government. The receipts of the Theatre Francais were more than $400,000; of the Vaudeville Theatre, about $280,000; of the Varieties, about $300,000 and of the Gaite, about $140,000. Sarah Barnhardt is playing every night to an average of $2,600; yesterday afternoon Mlle. Farguell was given a benefit at a theatre very close to my hotel, which netted her over $6,000. It was Goethe who said: "Not only do figures govern the world, but they also teach us how the world is governed," and he might have added that they also teach us how the "budget du plaisir" of the world increases from year to year. In the early part of the present century, on the occasion of the final benefit to Mlle. Mars, when that actress played the Countess in the "Marriage de Figaro," with Mlle. Dejazet as Cherubin and Mlle. Dorval as Suzanne, $2,500 was considered heavy receipts and the beneficiary thought a miracle had been performed in her favor. I have just mentioned the sum that the public of to-day allows to fall into the lap of an actress whom it considers worthy of its respect and admiration and who is retiring into private life.

IN THE SULTON'S HARUM.

The Life of Minister Wallace Tells of a Visit to Nourmahal.

From the Light of the Harem.

A broad, low divan of pale blue silk ran round the apartment. No pictures on the marble walls, no books, no bric-a-brac, no trumpery "collections," ceramics, æsthetic trash, grave or gay, nor muffling hangings. These are not oriental luxuries; but instead, a cool, shady emptyness, plenty of space for the breeze to flutter the gauzy curtains and carry the echo of the plash and drip of the fountains.

At the furtherest end, and reclining on pillows of silk and lace, rested the lady we sought. One little foot, in red velvet slipper, was first seen below white trousers of yellow silk; a loose robe of white silk, embroidered with gold thread, was perfectly covered by a sleeveless jacket of crimson, dotted with seed pearl; a broad variegated sash wound the slender waist. Half concealing the arms was a light scarf fairy as the woven wind of the ancients. A head-band, with diamond pendants, fringed her forehead; a reviere of diamonds circled the bare throat, and here and there solitary drops flashed in the braids of her night-black hair. Among the billowy cushions and vaporous veilings rose the young face—oh, what a revelation of beauty!—uplifted in a curious, questioning way, to see what manner of women these are, who come from the ends of the earth with unveiled faces, and go about the world alone, and have to think for themselves—poor things! The expression was that of a lovely child waking from slumber in the happiest humor, ready to play. A sensitive, exquisite face, fair as the first of women while the angel was yet unfallen. A perfect oval, the lips a scarlet thread, and oh, those wonderful Asiatic eyes—lustrous, coal-black, long, rather round, beaming under the joined eyebrows of which the poet Hafiz sings.

Nourmahal did not rise, but held out one jeweled hand, dimpled as a baby's, with nails and finger ends dyed pink with henna—five clustered rosebuds. The magic of beauty made us her subjects. We kissed the little fingers loyally, and yielded ourselves willing captives ready to be dragged at her chariot-wheels. My life-long notions of the subjection of a woman (see Stuart Mill) and the wretchedness of prisoners pining in palatial splendors vanished at the first glance; went down at a touch, like the wounded knight in the lists of Templestowe. She smiled and hoped we were well; then followed suitable inquiries as to health and journeys, and expressions of the charm of finding it all out. I ventured the high assertion that we had sailed 6,000 miles on purpose to lay our homage at her blessed feet; which rhetorical flourish was received with a childish nod at about what it was worth. Somehow she did not seem so enchanted with her new worshippers as they were with her. It appeared the Beauty had never seen the sea except from the shore.

At the signal the slaves disappeared, except one old woman and the negroes, silent as ghosts beside the Labora drapery. In a few minutes five slaves returned, each carrying a small round table of cedar, inlaid with scraps of mother-of-pearl. Five others followed, with lighted cigarettes lying each in a silver saucer; and coffee in tiny cups, about the size of a giant's thimble, resting in a silver filagree holder, set round with diamonds.

"My new friends have come so far," said Nourmahal, "they must be tired. Take a cigarette and refresh yourselves."

I rather awkwardly adjusted the holder of amber and ventured one faint whiff. Imagine my astonishment at seeing my friend, whose name with difficulty I surpress, puff away like a dissipated old smoker. The Armenian was native and to the manner born. Nourmahal smoked, of course, and a lulling calm succeeded the excitement of the brilliant conversation reported above. While feeling round in my brain for a subject of common interest, adapted to my hostesses' capacity and mine, I tried a sip of the coffee. It was strong enough to bear up an egg, thick with grounds and bitter as death. I pretended to deep enjoyment of the dose, and sipped it, drop by drop, to the bitter end.

Nourmahal clapped her hands again, and the ten virgins took away the saucers. I think none of them were foolish, for they fell into line without effort, each one treading in the footsteps of her predecessor at an interval to avoid her train.

"In this charming palace you must be very happy. How do you pass the time?"

The dimples deepened in the cheeks of Beauty.

"Pass the time, pass the time?" she dreamily repeated, playing with the knotted fringes of her scarf. "I do not pass it, it passes itself!" and again she laughed, and the laughter was as sweet as the tenderest voice can make it.

"Are you fond of music?"

Three ladies in black: "Oh! very," "Oh! very." Oh! very."

"Then you shall be amused." She clapped the rose-leaf palms, and in marched eight women musicians (we saw no men that day but the harem guard), bearing stringed instruments, curious looking things, like over-grown violins and half-finished guitars, and a round shell, with strings across, beaten with two sticks.

Didst ever hear Arabic music, beloved? No? Then never hast thou known sorrow. Since Jubal first struck the gamut, there can have been no improvement in these compositions. How long the exercises lasted I am unable to record; but I do know we grew old fast under the beat, beat, hammer, hammer, in the terse, unmeaning notes of the banjo. In the brief interval at the end of a peculiarly agonizing strain, sung by the mulatto, I seized the moment to ask what were the words of the song, and was told it is a serenade, very ancient, dating back to the times of Ignorance, before the coming of Mahomet, whose tomb is covered with the splendor of unceasing light.

Would Settle it Himself.

A "Clergyman" writes to an English paper: "I am glad you sympathize with the omission of the word "obey" in the marriage ceremony. "I make a point of never using that wicked expression in reading the marriage vow to those about to be united for life. In a neighboring church, the bride proving dumb at this objectionable word, the bridegroom bade the clergyman continue; "for," said he, shaking his fist, "we'll settle that 'ere among ourselves arterwards." This anecdote illustrates the nature and the matrimonial views of those who still advocate the alternative of slavery or perjury being offered to a bride."

FROM THE PERSIAN.

"Take up thy cup and goblet, Love," I said,
"Haunt purling river bank and glassy glade;
Full many a moon-like form has heaven's wheel
Oft into cup, oft into goblet made.

"We buy new wine and old, our cups to fill,
And sell for two grains this world's good and ill;
Know you where you will go to after death?
Set wine before me, and go where you will!

"Was e'er man born who never went astray?
Did ever mortal pass a sinless day?
If I do ill do not requite with ill!
Evil for evil how canst thou repay?

"Bring forth that ruby gem of Badakhshan,
That heart's delight, that balm of Turkestan;
They say 'tis wrong for Mussulmans to drink,
But ah! where can we find a Mussulman?

"My body's life and strength proceed from thee!
My soul within and spirit are of thee!
My being is of thee, and thou art mine,
And I am thee since I am lost in thee.

"Man, like a ball, hither and thither goes,
As fate's resistless bat directs the blows;
But he, who gave thee up to this rude sport—
He knows what drives thee, yea. He knows, he knows."

THE BARK FORTUNA.

Capt. Montague Beresford Pierpoint was hardly the sort of a man you would have expected to find behind the counter of a small shanty bank at Aylmer's Pike, Colo. There was an engaging English frankness, and obvious honesty and refinement of manner about him which suited very oddly with the rough habits and rougher Western speech of the mining population in whose midst he lived. Indeed, to say so much is rather to underrate the uniqueness of his position; for it might perhaps be truer to say that Capt. Pierpoint was the only man in the place in whom any one believed at all in any way.

Capt. Pierpoint walked very straight and erect, as becomes a man of conspicuous uprightness, and there was a certain tinge of military bearing in his manner which seemed at first sight sufficiently to justify his popular title. But he himself made no false pretenses upon that head; he freely acknowledged that he had acquired the position of captain, not in Her Britannic Majesty's Guards, as the gossip of Aylmer's Pike sometimes asserted, but in the course of his early professional engagements as skipper of a Lake Superior grain vessel. The one thing he really understood, he would tell his mining friends, was the grain trade on the upper lakes; for finance he had but a single recommendation, and that was that if the people trusted him he could never deceive them. Capt. Pierpoint had not come to Aylmer's Pike at first with any settled idea of making himself the financier of the rough little community; he intended to dig on his own account, and the role of banker was only slowly thrust upon him by the unanimous voice of the whole diggings. Gradually the diggers got into the habit of regarding this as Capt. Pierpoint's natural function, and Capt. Pierpoint, being himself but an indifferent digger, acquiesced so readily that at last, yielding to the persuasion of his clients, he put up a wooden counter, and painted over his rough door the magnificent notice, "Aylmer's Pike Bank; Montague Pierpoint, Manager." He got a large iron safe from Carson City, and in that safe, which stood by his own bedside, all the silver and other securities of the whole village were duly deposited. "Any of the boys could easily shoot me and open that safe any night," Capt. Pierpoint used to say pleasantly; "but if he did, by George! he'd have to reckon afterwards with every man on the Pike, and I should be sorry to stand in his shoes—that I would, any time."

However, even at Aylmer's Pike there were degrees and stages of comparative unscrupulousness. Two men, newcomers to the pike, by name Hiram Coffin and Pete Morris, at last wickedly and feloniously conspired together to rob Captain Pierpoint's bank. Their plan was simplicity itself. They would go at midnight, very quietly, to the captain's house, cut his throat as he slept, rob the precious safe, and ride off straight for the East, thus getting a clear night's start of any possible pursuer. It was an easy enough thing to do; and they were really surprised in their own minds that nobody else had ever been cute enough to seize upon such an obvious and excellent path to wealth and security.

The day before the night the two burglars had fixed upon for their enterprise, Capt. Pierpoint himself appeared to be in unusual spirits. Pete Morris called in at the bank during the course of the morning to reconnoitre the premises, under pretense of paying in a few dollars' worth of silver, and he found the Captain very lively indeed. When Pete handed him the silver across the counter the Captain weighed it with a smile, gave a receipt for the amount—he always gave receipts as a matter of form—and actually invited Pete into the little back room, which was at once kitchen, bedroom and parlor, to have a drink. Then, before Pete's very eyes, he opened the safe, bursting with papers, and placed the silver in a bag on a shelf by itself, sticking the key into his waistcoat pocket. "He is delivering himself up into our hands," thought Pete to himself, as the Captain poured out two glasses of old Bourbon, and handed one to the miner opposite. "Here's success to all our enterprises!" cried the Captain gaily. "Here success, pard!" Pete answered, with a sinister look, which even the Captain could not help noting in a sidelong fashion.

That night, about 2 o'clock, when all Aylmer's Pike was quietly dreaming its own sordid, drunken dreams, two sober men rose up from their cabin and stole out softly to the wooden bank house. Two horses were ready, saddled with Mexican saddlebags, and tied to a tree outside the digging, and in half an hour Pete and Hiram hoped to find themselves in full possession of all Capt. Pierpont's securities, and well on their road toward the nearest station of the Pacific railway. They groped along to the door of the bank shanty and began fumbling with their wire picks at the rough lock. After a moment's exploration of the wards Pete Morris drew back in surprise.

"Pard," he murmured in a low whisper, "here's suthin' rather extraordinary; this 'ere lock's not fastened."

They turned the handle gently and found that the door opened without an effort. Both men looked at one another in the dim light incredulously. He actually slept in the bank shanty with his outer door unfastened!

The two robbers passed through the outer room and into the little back bedroom-parlor. To their immense astonishment they found it empty.

Their first impulse was to suppose that the captain had somehow anticipated their coming and had gone out to rouse the boys. For a moment they almost contemplated running away without the money. But a good glance reassured them; the bed had not been slept in. The captain was a man of very regular habits.

Hiram held the lantern, carefully shaded by his hand, toward the door of the safe. Pete looked cautiously at the lock, and began pushing it about with his wire pick; he had hoped to get the key out of Capt. Pierpont's pocket, but as that easy scheme was so unexpectedly spoiled, he trusted to his skill in picking to force the lock open. Once more a fresh surprise awaited him. The door opened almost of its own accord! Pete looked at Hiram, and Hiram looked at Pete. There was no mistaking the strange fact that met their gaze—the safe was empty.

"What on airth do you suppose is the meaning of this, Pete?" Hiram whispered hoarsely. But Pete did not whisper; the whole truth flashed upon him in a moment, and he answered aloud, with a string of oaths, "The Cap'n has gone and made tracks hisself for Madison depot. And he's taken every red cent in the safe along with him, too! the dirty scoundrel! He's taken even my silver that he give me a receipt for this very morning!"

Hiram stared at Pete in blank amazement. "Perhaps he's got wind of this and took off the plate to somebody else's hut. If the boys was to come and catch us here, it 'ud be derned awkward for you an' me, Pete." But Pete answered gruffly and loudly, "Never you mind about the plate, pard. The cap'n's gone, and the plate's gone with him; and what we've got to do now is to rouse the boys and ride after him like greased lightnin'. The mean swindler, to go and swindle me out of the silver that I've been and dug out of that there claim yonder with my own pick!" For the sense of personal injustice to oneself rises perennially in the human breast, however depraved, and the man who would murder another without a scruple is always genuinely aghast with just indignation when he finds the counsel for the prosecution pressing a point against him with what seems to him unfair persistency.

Pete flung his lock-pick out among the agave scrub that faced the bank shanty, and ran out wildly into the midst of the dusty white road that led down the row of huts which the people of Aylmer's pike euphemistically described as the Main street. There he raised such an unearthly whoop as roused the sleepers in the nearest huts to turn over in their beds and listen in wonder, with a vague idea that "the Injuns" were coming down on a scalping trail upon the diggings. Next, he hurried down the street, beating heavily with his fist on every frame door, and kicking hard at the log walls of the successive shanties. In a few minutes the whole pike was out and alive. Unwholesome-looking men, in unwashed flannel shirts and loose trouses, mostly barefooted in their haste, came forth to inquire, with an unnecessary wealth of expletives, what the something was stirring. Pete, breathless and wrathful in the midst, livid with rage and disappointment, could only shriek aloud: "Cap'n Pierpoint has cleared out of camp and taken all the plate with him!" There was at first an incredulous shouting and crying; then a general stampede toward the bank shanty; and, finally, as the truth became apparent to everybody, a deep and angry howl for vengeance on the traitor. In one moment Capt. Pierpoint's smooth-faced villainy dawned as clear as day to all Aylmer's Pike; and the whole chorus of gamblers, rascals and blacklegs stood awe-struck with horror and indignation at the more plausible rogue who had succeeded in swindling even them. The clean-washed, white-shirted, fair-spoken villain! they would have his blood for this, if the United States marshal had every mother's son of them strung up in a row for it after the pesky business was once fairly over.

When the boys really understood that they had been completely duped, they swore vengeance in solemn fashion, and they picked out two of themselves to carry out the oath in a regular assembly. Each contributed of his substance what he was able; and Pete and Hiram, being more stirred with righteous wrath than all the rest put together, were unanimously deputed to follow the captain's tracks to San Francisco, and to have his life whatever and whenever they might chance to find him. Pete and Hiram accepted the task thrust upon them, con amore, and went forth zealously to hunt up the doomed life of Capt. Montague Beresford Pierpoint.

II.

Society in Sarnia admitted that Capt. Pierpoint was really quite an acquisition. As a matter of fact, indeed, the captain was decently well-born, the son of an English country clergyman, educated at a respectable grammar school, and capable of being all things to all men in whatever station of life it might please Providence to place him.

Somehow or other, everything seemed to go wrong with Capt. Pierpoint's cargoes. He was always losing a scow laden with the best fall wheat from Chicago for Buffalo, or running a lumber vessel ashore on the shoals of Lake Erie, or getting a four-master jammed in the ice-packs on the St. Clair river; and though the insurance companies continually declared that Capt. Pierpoint had got the better of them, the captain himself was wont to complain that no insurance could ever possibly cover the losses he sustained by the carelessness of his subordinates or the constant perversity of wind and waters.

However this might be, it happened curiously enough that, in spite of all his losses, Capt. Pierpoint seemed to grow richer and richer visibly to the naked eye, with each reverse of his trading efforts. He took a handsome house, set up a carriage and pair, and made love to the prettiest and sweetest girl in all Sarnia. The prettiest and sweetest girl was not proof against Capt. Pierpoint's suave tongue and handsome house; and she married him in very good faith, honestly believing in him, as a good woman will in a scoundrel, and clinging to him fervently with all her heart and soul. No happier and more loving pair in all Sarnia than Capt. and Mrs. Pierpoint.

Some months after the marriage Capt. Pierpoint arranged to take down a scow or flat-bottomed boat, laden with grain, from Milwaukee for the Erie canal. He took up the scow himself, and, before he started for the voyage, it was a curious fact that he went in person down into the hold, bored eight large holes right through the bottom and filled each up, as he drew out the auger, with a caulked plug made exactly to fit it, and hammered firmly into place with a wooden mallet. There was a ring in each plug, by which it could be pulled out again without much difficulty; and the whole eight were all placed along the gangway of the hold, where no cargo would lie on top of them. The scow's name was the Fortune.

It took only two men and the skipper to navigate the scow, for lake craft towed by steam propellers are always very lightly manned, and when Capt. Pierpoint reached Milwaukee, where he was to take in cargo, he dismissed the two sailors who had come with him from Sarnia, and engaged two fresh hands at the harbor. Rough, miner-looking men they were, with very little of the sailor about them, but Capt. Pierpoint's sharp eyes soon told him they were the right sort of men for his purpose, and he engaged them on the spot without a moment's hesitation.

They had disguised themselves as well as they were able, and in their clumsy knavery they thought they had completely deceived the captain. But almost from the moment the captain saw them he knew who they were, and he took his measures accordingly. "Stupid louts!" he said to himself, with the fine contempt of an educated scoundrel for the unsophisticated natural ruffian; "here's a fine chance of killing two birds with one stone!" and when the captain said the word "killing" he said it in his own mind, with a delicate, sinister emphasis, which meant business.

As soon as she was once clear of the wharf, and while the busy shipping of the great port still surrounded them on every side, Capt. Pierpoint calmly drew his revolver and took his stand beside the hatches. "Pete and Hiram," he said quietly to his two assistants, "I want to have a little serious talk with you two before we go any further."

If he had fired upon them outright instead of merely calling them by their own names, the two common conspirators could not have started more unfeignedly, or looked more unspeakably cowed, than they did at that moment. Their first impulse was to draw their own revolvers in return; but they saw in a second that the captain was beforehand with them, and that they had better not try to shoot him before the very eyes of all Milwaukee.

"Now, boys," the captain went on steadily, with his finger on the trigger and his eye fixed straight on the men's faces, "we three quite understand one another. I took your savings for reasons of my own; and you have shipped here to-day to murder me on the voyage. But I recognized you before I engaged you, and I have left word at Milwaukee that if anything happens to me on this journey, you two have a grudge against me, and must be hanged for it. I've taken care that if this scow comes into any port along the lakes without me aboard, you two are to be promptly arrested." (This was false, of course, but to Capt. Pierpoint a small matter like that was a mere trifle.) "And I've shipped myself along with you just to show you I'm not afraid of you. But if either of you disobeys my orders in anything for one minute, I shoot at once, and no jury in Canada or the States will touch a hair of my head for doing it. I am a respectable shipowner and grain merchant; you're a pair of disreputable, skulking miners, pretending to be sailors, and you've shipped aboard here on purpose to murder and rob me. If you shoot me, it's murder; if I shoot you, it's justifiable homicide. Now, boys, do you understand that?"

Pete looked at Hiram and was beginning to speak, when the captain interrupted him in the calm tone of one having authority. "Look here, Pete," he said, drawing a chalk line amidships across the deck, "you stand this side of that line and you stand there, Hiram. Now, mind, if either of you chooses to step across that line, or to confer with the other, I shoot you, whether it's here before all the eyes of Milwaukee, or alone in the middle of Huron. You must each take your own counsel and do as you like for yourselves. But I've got a little plan of my own on, and if you choose willingly to help me in it your fortune's made. Look at the thing squarely, boys; what's the use of your killing me? Sooner or later you'll get hung for it, and it's a very unpleasant thing, I can assure you, hanging." As the captain spoke he placed his unoccupied hand loosely on his throat and pressed it gently backward. Pete and Hiram shuddered a little as he did so. "Well, what's the good of ending your lives that way, eh? But I'm doing a little speculative business on these lakes, where I want just such a couple of men as you two—men that'll do just as they're told in a matter of business and ask no squeamish questions. If you care to help me in this business you can stop and make your fortunes; if you don't, you can go back to Milwaukee with the tug."

"You speak fair enough," said Pete, dubitatively, "but you, cap'n, you ain't a man to be trusted. I owe you one already for stealing my silver."

"Very little silver," the captain answered, with a wave of the hand and a graceful smile. "Bonds, United States bonds and greenbacks most of it, converted before hand for easier conveyance by horseback. These, however, are business details which needn't stand in the way between you and me, partner. I always was straight-forward in all my dealings, and I'll come to the point at once, so that you can help me or not. This scow's plugged at the bottom. My intention is, first, to part the rope that ties us to the tug; next, to transfer the cargo by night to a small shanty I've got on Manitoulin island, and then to pull the plugs and sink the scow on Manitoulin rocks. That way I get insurance for the cargo and scow, and carry on the grain in the slack season. If you consent to help me unload and sink the ship, you shall have half profits between you; if you don't, you can go back to Milwaukee like a couple of fools, and I'll put into port again to get a couple of pluckier fellows. Answer each for yourselves. Hiram, will you go with me?"

"How shall I know you'll keep your promise?" asked Hiram.

"For the best of all possible reasons," replied the captain, jauntily; "because, if I don't, you can inform upon me to the insurance people."

In Hiram Coffin's sordid soul there was a moment's turning over of the chances; and then greed prevailed over revenge and he said, grudgingly:

"Well, cap'n, I'll go with you."

The captain smiled the smile of calm self-approbation and turned half round to Pete.

"And you?" he asked.

"If Hiram goes I go too," Pete answered, half hoping that some chance might occur for conferring with his neighbor on the road and following out their original conspiracy. But Capt. Pierpoint had been too much for him; he had followed the excellent rule, "divide et impera," and he remained clearly master of the situation. Capt. Pierpoint certainly didn't spend a comfortable time during his voyage down the lake or through the Straits of Mackinaw. To say the truth, he could hardly sleep at all, and he was very fagged and weary when they arrived at Manitoulin Island. But Pete and Hiram, though they had many chances of talking together, could not see their way to kill him in safety; and Hiram at least, in his own mind, had come to the conclusion that it was better to make a little money than to risk one's neck for a foolish revenge. So in the dead of the night, on the second day out, when a rough wind had arisen from the north and a fog had come over them, the captain quietly began to cut away at the rope that tied them to the tug. He cut the rope all round, leaving a sound core in the center, and when the next guest of wind came the rope strained and parted quite naturally, so that the people on the tug never suspected the genuineness of the transaction. They looked about in the fog and storm for the scow, but of course they couldn't find her, for Capt. Pierpoint, who knew his ground well, had driven her straight ashore before the wind, and beached her on a small shelving cove on Manitoulin island. There they found five men waiting for them, who helped unload the cargo with startling rapidity, for it was all arranged in sacks, not in bulk, and a high slide fixed on the gangway enabled them to slip it quickly into an underground granary excavated below the level of the beach. After unloading they made their way down before the breeze toward the jagged rocks of Manitoulin.

It was 11 o'clock on a stormy moonlight night when the Fortuna arrived off the jutting point of the great island. A "black squall," as they call it on the lakes, was blowing down from the Sault Ste. Marie. The scow drove about aimlessly under very little canvas, and the boat was ready to be lowered, "in case," the captain said humorously, "of any accident." Close to the end of the point the captain ordered Pete and Hiram down into the hold. He had shown them beforehand the way to draw the plugs, and had explained that the water would rise very slowly and they would have plenty of time to get up the companion ladder long before there was a foot deep of water in the hold. At the last moment Pete hung back a little. The captain took him quietly by the shoulders and without an oath (an omission which told eloquently on Pete) thrust him down the ladder, and told him in his calmest manner to do his duty. Hiram held the light in his hand and both went down together into the black abyss. There was no time to be lost; they were well off the point, and in another moment the wreck would have lost all show of reasonable probability.

As the two miners went down into the hold Capt. Pierpont drew quietly from his pocket a large hammer and a packet of five-inch nails. They were good stout nails and would resist a considerable pressure. He looked carefully down into the hold and saw the two men draw the first plug. One after another he watched them until the fourth was drawn, and then he took one of the nails firmly between his thumb and forefinger.

Next week everybody at Sarnia was grieved to hear that another of Capt. Pierpont's vessels had gone down off Manitoulin point in that dreadful black squall on Thursday evening. Both the sailors on board had been drowned. Still, it was a fortunate thing that such a delightful man as the captain had not perished in the foundering of the Fortuna.

III.

Somehow, after that wreck Capt. Pierpont never cared for the water again. His nerves were shattered, he said, and he couldn't stand danger as he used to do when he was younger and stronger. So he went on the lake no more, and confined his attention strictly to the "futures" business. He was a thriving and prosperous person in spite of his losses, and the underwriters had begun to look a little askance at his insurances even before this late foundering case. Some whispered ominously in underwriting circles that they had their doubts about the Fortuna.

One summer a few years later the water on Lake Huron sank lower than it had ever been known to sink before. It was a very dry season in the back country, and the rivers brought down very diminished streams into the great basins. Foot by foot the level of the lake fell slowly till many of the wharves were left high and dry, and the vessels could only come alongside in very few deep places. Capt. Pierpoint had suffered much from sleeplessness, combined with Canadian ague, for some years past, but this particular summer his mind was very evidently much troubled. For some unaccountable reason he watched the falling of the river with the intensest anxiety, and after it had passed a certain point his interest in the question became painfully keen. Though the fever and the ague gained upon him from day to day and his doctor counselled perfect quiet, he was perpetually consulting charts and making measurements of the configuration which the coast had now reached, especially at the upper end of Lake Huron. At last his mind seemed almost to give way, and weak and feverish as he was he insisted, the first time for many seasons, that he must take a trip upon the water. Remonstrance was quite useless; he would go on the lake again, he said, if it killed him. So he hired one of the little steam pleasure yachts which are always to let in numbers at Detroit, and started with his wife and her brother, a young surgeon, for a month's cruise into Lake Superior.

As the yacht neared Manitoulin Island Capt. Pierpoint insisted upon being brought up on deck in a chair—he was too ill to stand—and swept all the coast with his binocular. Close to the point a flat-topped object lay mouldering in the sun, half out of the water, on the shoals by the bank. "What is it, Ernest?" asked the captain, trembling, of his brother-in-law.

"A wreck, I should say," the brother-in-law answered, carelessly. "By Jove, now I look at it with the glass I can read the name, 'Fortuna, Sarnia.'"

Capt. Pierpoint seized the glass with a shaking hand and read the name on the stern himself in a dazed fashion. "Take me down stairs," he said feebly, "and let me die quietly; and for heaven's sake, Ernest, never let her know about it all."

They took him back and buried him at Sarnia, and all the world went to attend the funeral, as of a man who died justly respected for his wealth and other socially admired qualities. But his brother-in-law knew there was a mystery somewhere in the wreck of the Fortuna, and as soon as the funeral was over he went back with the yacht, and took its skipper with him to examine the stranded vessel. When they came to look at the bottom they found eight holes in it. Six of them were wide open, one was still plugged, and the remaining one had the plug pulled half out, inward, as if the persons who were pulling it had abandoned the attempt for fear of the rising water. That was bad enough, and they did not wonder that Capt. Pierpoint had shrunk in horror from the revealing of the secret of the Fortuna.

But when they scrambled on the deck they discovered another fact which gave a more terrible meaning to the dead man's tragedy. The covering of the hatchway by the companion-ladder was battened down, and nailed from the upper side with five-inch nails. The skipper loosened the rusty iron with his knife, and after a while they lifted the lid off and descended carefully into the empty hold below. As they suspected, there was no damaged grain in it; but at the foot of the companion ladder, left behind by the retreating water, two half-cleaned skeletons in sailor clothes lay huddled together loosely on the floor. That was all that remained of Pete and Hiram. Evidently the captain had nailed the hatch down on top of them and left them there terror-stricken to drown as the water rushed in and rose around them.

For a while the skipper and the brother-in-law kept the dead man's secret, but they did not try to destroy or conceal the proofs of his guilt, and in time others visited the wreck till bit by bit the horrible story leaked out in its entirety. Nowadays, as you pass the Great Manitoulin island, every sailor on the lake route is, ready to tell you this strange and ghastly yarn of the foundering of the Fortuna.

WHAT FOUR MAIDENS CAUGHT.

Four marrying maidens summering went,
Each cast her little net;
Returning, they relate to "Ma,"
What fortune each has met.

"O, Ma!" said intellectual Jane,
"I caught a college man;
No money—but his stock of brains
Would load a caravan."

"O, Ma!" remarked young Sophy Ann,
"I caught a splendid dude:
No brains—but lots of cash,
And bluest sort of blood."

"O, Ma!" said delicate Louise,
"I gained some strength and health;
I also caught a journalist
Whose brains will gain him wealth."

"No time to fish had I," said Nan
(Some thirty-four years old),
"Yet, staying out to watch these girls,
I caught a dreadful cold."

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Aprons the Fashion.

Among the modern revivals of old fashions is that of aprons, which are rapidly coming back into vogue on all except state occasions. The foreign fashion magazines say that abroad every one wears them, and the current number of the London Queen devotes quite a lengthy article to the subject. The prettiest aprons of the season hail from Paris, and they nearly all have bibs. Some are made entirely of black lace, others of white. Velvet plays a conspicuous part in nearly all, especially red velvet, of which several of the bibs are made. Tufts of chenille appear on many, while some are composed entirely of the petit pois (spotted) lisse, which is studded all over with tiniest pea-drops. A red velvet apron with bib was bordered and striped with lace, and had a lace pocket at one side. The ordinary size of the fashionable aprons of to-day is three-quarters square, but closely gathered at the waist, thus diminishing the apparent width. Some in black lace have a black lace fichu combined with them, so that quite a simple morning costume is transformed into a dressy one thereby.

Some black satin aprons display a large embroidered sunflower in gold thread or jet. Some, again, have braces to bibs, as in the case of a black satin one, with small plaited flounces, each edged with gold braid. To this was a pointed side piece, meeting at the back, and tied round the skirt with a bow of ribbon. Madras muslin, trimmed with lace and colored ribbon, is worn for bazaar aprons, and also Spanish blonde, white and black. Cotton aprons are still worn for lawn-tennis and other useful purposes, but in those there is little that is new.

An apron stall at a bazaar is always a success, and now, with the returning favor with which aprons are viewed for everyday wear, would bring in a good sum. Mixed with the more elaborate velvet, lace and silk, there should be schoolroom aprons in brown holland, made with pockets, bibs and shoulder straps; housekeeper's aprons, with the lower edge turned up, to make a deep pocket, and stitched in the center, and a small pocket above, on the right side. These also are suitable for gardening, and for ladies maids' wear. Bibs are mostly six inches deep and eight broad at the top, tapering to the waist.

Black velvet brocade and lace is quite the newest idea for bibbed aprons of the most fashionable kind, and these are as much for evening as day wear, the light silk and jetted lace aprons being now considered a becoming addition to an evening gown. The Roman cooking aprons, made of a straight piece of crash or damask, are embroidered at both ends in cross-stitch, have the ends ravelled and fringed, and are tied round the waist with ribbon, but are worn for many occasions besides cooking.

Festival Hints.

New York Post: Almost every church now has its young people's association or guild. These organizations meet for the purpose of doing two things at once—to enjoy social evenings and to get money. All sorts of ingenious devices for getting money are invented. Among the latest developments in this direction are soap-bubble parties, where pipes are sold and soap suds furnished free. The pipes are ornamented with ribbons or with hand painting. Another plan is to provide some light and pleasing literary or musical programme, and then to have a lunch, which is provided in this way: Each lady prepares a basket of lunch for two, and puts her card in it. These baskets are then sold to the highest bidder, and the gentleman who is the purchaser eats the lunch with the lady whose card he finds in the basket. Some results of an amusing character are sometimes observed, as when a girl's brother pays a high price for her basket. The arrangement of the baskets affords opportunity for the exercise of a good deal of taste. Among the prettiest baskets at one of these entertainments were common grape baskets. They were covered with scarlet or pink or blue silesia; the basket was lined, and the silesia sewed on around the inside, and then turned over the edge. Instead of being left in plain folds, it was shirred in two or three places, and then was brought down closely and fastened to the bottom of the basket. Others were covered plainly, and were trimmed around the edge with the open-work paper that is used for putting on shelves. This would be turned over in the form of a ruffle. The handles were covered also, and had bows of ribbon tied on either in the center or at each side. Japanese paper napkins were used. The luncheon varied, but usually consisted of two sandwiches—always of bread, not biscuit—some delicate stalks of celery, with salt, two pieces of cake, and some fruit, either grapes, apples, or pears.

Five Ways of Serving Oranges.

Orange Cake: Twelve eggs, the weight of ten in pulverized sugar, the weight of six eggs in flour, the juice and grated peel of one orange, and half a lemon. Beat it like sponge cake, and bake it in jelly-cake pans. Take the whites of two eggs, half a pound of sugar, the juice and grated peel of one orange and half a lemon. Beat it and spread it between the layers of the cakes. Try this cake. It is a favorite.

Orange Souffle: Peel and slice six oranges, put in a glass dish a layer of oranges, then one of sugar, and so on until all the oranges are used, and let stand two hours; make a soft-boiled custard of yolks of three eggs, a pint of milk, sugar to taste, pith grating of orange peel for flavor, and pour over the oranges when cool enough not to break the dish. Beat the whites of the eggs to a stiff froth, sweeten to taste and pour over the top. Serve cold.

Orange Pie: Take four good-sized oranges, peel, seed and cut in very small pieces. Add a cup of sugar and let stand. Into a quart of nearly boiling milk stir two tablespoonfuls of corn starch, mixed with a little water, and the yolks of three eggs. When this is done let it cool, then mix with the oranges. Put it in simply a lower crust. Make a frosting of the whites of the eggs and one-half cup of sugar. Spread it over top of pies, and place for a few seconds in the oven to brown.

Italian Orange Ice Cream: One pint and a half best cream, twelve ounces of white pulverized sugar, the juice of six oranges, two teaspoonfuls of orange extract, the yolks of eight eggs and a pinch of salt. Mix in a porcelain-lined basin, and stir over the fire until it begins to thicken; strain through a hair sieve into the freezer and finish.

Orange and Cocoanut: Three peeled oranges. make alternate layers of orange slices, sugar and grated cocoanut until a glass dish is filled; having grated cocoanut on top, pour claret wine over the top, to run through the layers.

Feathers and Hats.

Fine feathers are the feature of the new millinery. One arrangement of plumage consists in placing the wings of small birds erect all over the flat crown, so as to compose the foundation of the bonnet itself, finishing the brim off with a bouillone of velvet, and setting loops of very dark ribbon among some of the wings, so as to produce the appearance of a cockade on one side. Thus may linnets' wings be combined with cypress green velvet and ribbon, and those of the rose bunting with brown or fawn. Pipings of satin sewn together like straw make very effective capotes. One, of a delicate reseda green, is edged with a thick pleating of velvet rouleaux and ornamented with a bunch of emus' feathers and another of ottoman ribbon bows. Transparent black net bonnets have appeared with the theater season, mostly trimmed with bows of bright ribbons or plumes of ostrich tips, and here and there a posy of velvet blossoms. As the season advances the hats become more highly decorative. Crowns are draped with velvet, and birds are sometimes arranged with their wings outspread. The mixture of colors is at the same time less sober. Here is a myrtle green hat with a high crown trimmed with the speckled plumage of the owl; a gray felt, encircled with a band to match, ornamented with gray dove's feathers and a bunch of dark blue satin and ottoman ribbon. Another gray felt, edged with a chain of black bugles and draped with maroon velvet—two gray and black birds with crimson crests set among the folds. Black felt hats are also in some favor, with or without a bright dash of color in the plumage to give them life. When colored feathers are not added, a bunch of ribbon may take their place, or merely an elegant silver or steel pin in the shape of a dagger, or a bodkin attached to a long cord coiled several times around the crown. A dull gold bodkin and crimson cord look very well on a hat entirely black for the rest, while for mourning, a frosted silver skewer brightens up black sufficiently.

Worn Out Rugs.

New York Letter: No folly in fashion has exceeded, or ever will exceed, the current craze in this city for antique rugs. These articles are brought from Asia, where they are woven by hand, and where some are used by Mohammedans to pray upon. They are good exhibits of industry and taste in the blending of bright colors harmoniously into intricate patterns. Of course, the work is not so exact or symmetrical as though done by machinery. The figures vary in size, the shapes are a little irregular, and there are other blemishes inseparable from labor done with the fingers. But the dyes are fast, the wool astonishingly soft and fine, and a few years of wear imparts to the surface a peculiar and beautiful sheen. These are the plain facts about the Eastern rug. Mark the distortion which an artistic thing suffers when subjected to popularity. If age beautifies a rug, then a rug can't be too dilapidated. That is the reasoning of the fools, or their conclusion, for to concede that they reason at all is too much. The stores are therefore stocked with rugs that are worn threadbare, that are ragged at the edges and patched in the centers, that are extravagant in price on account of these defects, and that, if their condition has really been caused by the feet and knees of Mussulmans and other foul Orientals, ought to be so suggestive of irredeemable nastiness as to be intolerable in a Christian parlor.

"Whisper," responded a dealer to whom I made that criticism; "in a month or so I shall have a lot of antique rugs that your sensitive stomach needn't roll at. They'll be tattered and torn—bet your life; but it'll be the neat and quick work of machinery. I imported a cargo of fresh, new rugs, and they're now being worn out by machines of my own invention. It's simply a carpet-beating apparatus run ten times as fast and a hundred times as long as it usually is to clean a piece of carpet; and when a rug gets through is willing to swear, solemn and conscientious, that it has been knelt on by greasy Turks for a thousand years.

Influence of Woman's Society.

It is better for you, says Thackeray, to pass an evening once or twice in a lady's drawing-room, even though the conversation is slow, and you know the girl's songs by heart, than in a club, tavern, or the pit of a theater. All amusements of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious to their nature. All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions and are stupid, or have gross tastes, and revolt against what is pure. You club swaggerers, who are sucking the butts of billiard cues all night, call female society insipid. Poetry is insipid to a yokel; beauty has no charms for a blind man; music does not please a poor beast who does not know one tune from another; and as a true epicure is hardly ever tired of water-souchy and brown bread and butter, I protest I can sit for a whole night talking to a well-regulated, kindly woman about her girl coming out, or her boy at Eton, and liking the evening' entertainment. One of the great benefits a man may derive from women's society is that he is bound to be respectful to them. The habit is of great good to your moral man, depend upon it. Our education makes us the most eminently selfish men in the world. We fight for ourselves, we push for ourselves, we yawn for ourselves, we light our pipes, and say we won't go out. We prefer ourselves and our ease; and the greatest good that comes to a man from a woman's society is that he has to think of somebody besides himself—somebody to whom he is bound to be constantly attentive and respectful.

Odd Jewelry.

In fancy jewelry everything odd and quaint finds favor. One brooch is an elephant's head in oxydized silver, with head trapping of gold, chased and fringed, with diamond eyes and ivory tusks tipped with gold. Others are spiders with cats'-eyes for bodies, and diamonds or emeralds for heads. There are dragon flies and beetles; paradise birds and humming birds; old Roman coins mounted on the fasces in gold, with silver bands tying the rods; crabs holding a pearl or a cat's-eye in their ugly claws, and pretty gipsy straw hats in gold with trimming of ribbon or flower in precious stones. The English ring of dull gold, either in crucible or beaten gold with sunk stones is the favorite style for gentlemen. For ladies, the solitaire, the cluster and the Marquise remain the first choice, with various fancy styles for those who affect the quaint and odd in jewelry. Scarf pins for gentlemen show a decided tendency toward the quaint and odd in design. There are standard patterns, notably the round pin, the dagger hilt, etc., with animals' heads and insects of all sorts, but the fashionable fancy is for something out of the ordinary style. Bits of crucible gold in odd shapes, with perhaps a single gem imbedded in the rough gold, are new and elegant. Men of wealth and taste wear rare and curious stones in preference to diamonds for scarf-pins—star rubies, cats'-eyes, tourmalines in unusual colors, etc.; and there is a great fancy for lapis lazuli, for the Alexandrite, with its changing green and red hues, for the jacinth—in short, for everything which is likely not to be worn by the multitude. Black onyx, with pearls and diamonds, for the only jewels, is still the one idea in mourning jewelry. Ladies in half-mourning wear silver ornaments, and in these there are many pretty and artistic fancies.

A Woman's Devotion.

A Washington letter to the Christian Union says of a woman who has vainly tried to save George H. Butler from rum: "Who do you think is the only person on earth who still cares for that besotted wretch, George H. Butler! I will tell you. Accidentally, a few months ago, I met a sweet, loving lady. Her face, figure and manner were perfect. She looked to be twenty years old; they told me she was forty. She was sparkling, witty and handsome, a veritable actress. This is her history: Twenty years ago she met George Butler. They became affianced. She loved him only as such a woman loves, but after a time he had some disgraceful affair with an actress, and she refused to marry him. Offers of marriage came to her, but she said "no" to them all. Butler fell lower and lower, but she still watched over him. Scores of times he tried to reform, and she helped him, paid fines to get him out of the workhouse, bought clothes, and even went where her soul shamed from entering, in order to save him. Her friends protested, but she was firm. "There is too much good in him not to try to save him," she responded to such complaint. Herself earning a living by giving lessons in elocution, she spent for that man more than on herself. And to-day, a woman among a thousand in all that makes her sex attractive, she is alone in the world, because her love for this poor, tottering wreck is as hallowed as though he had been worthy of her. There are tragedies in this world which never come to light. The failure of one of these two has made the other a saint. So true is this that this man, steeped in rum, and almost imbruted, becomes almost an object of respect because he stands in the radiance of a woman's devotion."

The "Rosy Tinge."

Washington Letter: Rose Eytinge was here playing at one of the theaters last week. One evening I was standing in the rotunda when an old habitue told me the following, which I have never seen in print: When Rose was young she appeared here one winter. She was very handsome then. Henry J. Raymond, editor of the New York Times, was a member of congress, and became much fascinated with the beauty. One night a call of the house was ordered. Raymond was one of the delinquents whom the sergeant-at-arms produced after midnight. The correspondent of the Times was in the gallery. Not to lose a good sentiment, he included in the scene the following: "Then appeared Mr. Raymond, flushed with the rosy tinge of the morning." It was an excellent hit, and made no end of fun. A week after he was discharged. Raymond was not a man to be trifled with by a subordinate. That winter, Raymond and George Butler were admirers of this actress. Raymond is dead, and Butler is locked up in the work-house down back of the capitol. Do you suppose she thought of either of them when she was here?"

Club Ideas of Beauty.

New York Letter: Speaking of pretty women, the Manhattan Liberal club has discussed them. Each member gets a chance in the meetings to advocate his special hobby, and pays for the privilege by listening in turn to the others. I went to the last gathering. Dio Lewis had the first opportunity, and he used it, I need hardly say, to condemn the dress of women, literally from head to heels. They spoiled their hair by knotting it, their breasts by padding, their waists by corsets, their legs by garters and their feet by tight shoes. He declared that these devices ruined shape and health, and yet he admitted that our women were the most beautiful in the world. I am no expert in this matter, nor a defender of fashion's means of adornment, but I could not help thinking that the doctor's concession of superlative loveliness was a complete answer to his own accusation. If belles harm themselves so extensively, would they not be ugly wrecks instead of very handsome things? But Dio was at once assured by Stephen Pearl Andrews, Dr. Lambert, and others, that he was a drivelling idiot—an opinion which each seemed to hold of all the rest—and he retorted by offering to settle the differences, so far as he was concerned, by putting on the gloves and knocking out his critics, one by one. The fierceness of the debate exceeded anything that I had ever witnessed, and I finally departed in keen disappointment that there had, after all, been no prize fight.

Charming Woman.

It is the business of a woman of the world to be agreeable, says a writer in the Atlantic. She spares no pains to make herself just as good looking as possible, and just as charming, and she is always tolerant. She may think you a fool for your beliefs, but she doesn't tell you so brutally, or try to crush you with an avalanche of argument. She tries to look at the matter from your point of view; in short, she feigns a sympathy, if she have it not. Your women with a purpose think it wrong to feign anything. They won't pretend to be sympathetic any more than they will powder their faces, or let their dressmaker improve their figures. That's why they are so boring; they are too narrow to be sympathetic and too conscientious to be polite. It is earnestness that does it; earnestness is naturally narrowing. It is earnestness, too, which sets their nerves in a quiver and makes them so restless. They can never sit still; they are always twitching, don't you know? That's earnestness. It has a kind of electrical effect. Women in earnest have no repose or manner. But a woman of the world feigns that, just as she feigns sympathy, because it makes her pleasant to other people. Oh, there's no doubt of it; women with a purpose are vastly better than other women, but they are not nearly so nice!

Brocades In Cloaks.

The latest fancy is to make cloaks with back and fronts of brocade, and long, hanging sleeves of striped material. Brocades for dresses showing all the new shades, and old ones, too, since some conservative people cannot change with every season, and the oldest color is just as likely to be in good taste as the newest. Some novelties in brocades, both in the grounds and in the patterns upon them, can only be appreciated by being seen. Muscovites, with the ottoman effect, but plain back, and the winter surahs heavier, more closely woven, and of finer twill than the summer ones, a material always "in order" for old and young, for morning, noon and night, for house or street, and in order in another sense, since, if anything is everlasting wear, this is; and, kept modestly in the background, the old Roman silks—not a novelty, to be sure—but most desirable for the little people, for their beauty of color, and also—low be it spoken—because they do not show the spots that the dresses of all little people with any activity are sure to acquire, like plain materials. All the silks are of unusual width, a fact not always appreciated by careless buyers, but which makes a difference of several yards in the amount of material required for a costume.

Plumage.

The "wishbone" wedding has become the correct thing. The couple stand beneath a floral wishbone. After the ceremony the bride and groom are given the wishbone to pull. The tug results in a break somewhere, and whoever holds the long piece is absolved from getting up to build fires in the morning.

Brides' dresses are decorated in profusion with orange flowers alone or mingled with white roses, white jessamine, and lilies of the valley, all these flower decoration being put on in clusters, chaplets, sprays and garlands, or strewn all over in separate sprigs.

The newest Bernhardt gloves are four feet long, and are intended to form a mass of stylish wrinkles from shoulder to wrist.

The newest lace collars for children are of Irish point lace, with raised flowers like those on Pompadour lace.

Children's cloaks of dark velvet and wool are fashionably trimmed with light gray lambskin.

A slim figure and bunchy tournure is the style which Parisian women desire to have.

The satchel muff of plush or fur is popular for misses in their teens and school girls.

A shoulder cape of fur, with muff to match, forms the fur set of the season.

Glycine, a pale pinkish mauve, is the newest thing in colors for evening.

A clever Paris correspondent calls velveteen "the velvet of the street."

Slender lace pins are still the favorite form for brooches.

Velvet flowers are worn on Parisian bonnets.

Black hare is the popular fur of the winter.

Dancing dresses abroad are all made short.

Seal sacques are long and half-fitting.

Fur trimmings are very fashionable.

Steel blue is among new colors.

Butler and the Reporters.

An avalanche of plaudits saluted Gen. Butler when his turn came to speak at the New York Press club banquet last Tuesday night. "I desire to put myself right before the members of the press that I see before me," said the governor. "In my time I have had occasion to indulge in some pretty severe strictures on the members of the press." [Voices at the tables "That's so! Yes you have, Ben."] The speaker said that he had enjoyed the intimate acquaintance of many worthy and enterprising war correspondents, and to them he appealed as friends to testify to his uniformly kind disposition toward the working men of the press. He had always kept a place in a private car and a corner in his heart for the honest reporters. He liked the reporters, but he had never been able to get along very well with the night editors. "Last night," said the general, after a brief pause, "I addressed the Pharisees and to-night I address the scribes." [Applause.] Tracing the growth of the newspaper press from the period of the pamphlet to the present time, the speaker said that the great newspapers had ceased to be organs of any party or faction, but had become the dominant power in national politics. The newspapers might still extend their power and influence if they would discuss great principles in short paragraphs, and leave out personal abuse as not a convincing argument. The appreciative sentiment of the press made the laws of the land, for no law could be made in this land against a united press. Three cheers and a tiger followed Gen. Butler's brief address, and the cheers were repeated soon after when he took his departure.

He Believes in His Own Creation.

In a letter this week to the Cleveland branch of the National League for the Suppression of Polygamy, Senator Edmunds says: "My views in respect of further legislation regarding polygamy are mainly expressed in the bill reported last session by the committee on the committee on the judiciary, which I shall again introduce at this session, with, perhaps, some additional provisions. I have reason to believe that the legislation adopted is operating favorably to the end desired, and, if it can be supported and supplemented by legislation which the committee, on the occasion of the passing of the former bill, stated they expected to bring forward, I have no doubt that, with good administration, without which all laws are useless, we shall gradually extirpate the crime.

THE MODERN POET.

A Brahmin he sits apart,
Our modern poet, and gazes
Attentively into his heart:
And its faint and vaporous phases
Examines with infinite care,
All his feelings are thin as air;
All his passions are mild as milk;
He loves but the quaint and old:
He dares not be simple and bold;
But refines, and refines, and refines,
And treads on a thread as spare
As the spider's gauzy silk
That trembles in all its lines
With the breeze, and can scarcely hold
The dewdrop the morning has strung;
And so 'twixt the earth and the sky,
And to neither wed, he is hung;
And he ponders his words and his rhymes,
And his delicate tinkle of chimes,
And strives to be deep and intense;
While the world of beauty and sense,
The strong and palpitant world,
The powers and passions of man
By which it is whipped and whirled
Are only to him an offense.

A TENNESSEE STORY.

The Last of a Family of Murderers Meets a Violent Death—Three Victims of Three Brothers—Capturing a Train and Freeing a Prisoner—A Remarkable Story of Crime.

Chattanooga, Tenn., Correspondence of the Philadelphia Times: Andy Taylor was hanged at London to-day for one of the boldest crimes ever committed. The deed which led up to it was the murder of Capt. James Fletcher, in this city, Feb. 21, 1881, by John Taylor, the eldest brother of Andy. Taylor was the engineer on the steamboat Tellico. Fletcher was a boat builder, and on the day in question was engaged in making some repairs on the Tellico. A quarrel arose between him and Taylor, and the latter, being of a very impetuous nature, drew his pistol. Fletcher was an old man; Taylor a large, brawny giant, in his prime. When he drew his pistol the old man remarked that none but —— cowards carried pistols. Hardly had the words left his mouth when Taylor fired three times and the old man fell a corpse in his tracks. The murderer jumped into a boat, rowed rapidly down the river and was soon lost in the mountains. The cowardly murder created great excitement in the city and large posses started in pursuit, but were unsuccessful. After two months had passed Taylor was traced into the mountains of Roane county, Tenn., his house was surrounded by armed men, and he was forced to surrender. His trial was deferred nearly a year, but he was finally convicted of manslaughter and sentenced for ten years. He appealed to the supreme court. During his imprisonment he proved one of the most dangerous inmates of the jail and headed every plan to escape. He was regarded as one of the most desperate criminals ever confined here, and was known to have killed several men in Texas.

He was conveyed to the supreme court, in session at Knoxville, on Oct. 14, 1882. Two other prisoners were taken along; Taylor was handcuffed to one of these. He was placed in a front car and guarded by Sheriff W. T. Cate and Deputy Sheriff John J. Conway. When the train reached Philadelphia, Tenn., two men were seen to go aboard and enter the car where Taylor was guarded. They were tall, brawny ruffian-like men, and seemed intent on some deep design. The train had proceeded hardly four miles, when both strangers hurriedly arose, and one, who afterward proved to be Bob Taylor, placed his pistol to the deputy sheriff's head, and sent a bullet whizzing through his brain, while the other, who proved to be Andy, began firing at the sheriff. The car was in an uproar. The deputy sheriff died instantly, and John Taylor, at once jerked a pistol from the dead man's pocket and, handcuffed as he was, joined in the murder of the sheriff. The latter fired one shot before he died, and the bullet passed through John Taylor's wrist. The handcuffs were quickly unlocked, and the three ruffins hurriedly left the car, and, placing their weapons at the engineer's head, commanded him to move on. They seated themselves on the tender, and with leveled pistols compelled the train men to run through two stations at a high rate of speed. When they reached London, a distance of twenty miles, they mounted horses which were in waiting, and were off like the wind. The crime was committed in mid-day, in one of the most populous districts in the State. The murdered sheriff was one of the leading citizens of Chattanooga and had been in the office but two weeks; he was in the postal service and was prominently mentioned for postmaster.

Chattanooga was thrown into a frenzy of excitement when the news reached here, and widespread consternation prevailed. Half an hour after the affair was known a posse of 200 men, armed with Springfield rifles and headed by A. G. Sharp, who is now chief inspector of postoffices in the United States, boarded a special train and were speeding to the mountains, in the direction of which the murderers were fleeing. They scoured the country for two weeks, and additional posses were organized in nearly every county between this city and Knoxville, there being at one time no less than 2,500 men on the search; but all to no avail. The county and State offered rewards of $12,500 for the murderers, dead or alive, but no trace could be found.

When the murderers left London they proceeded through the mountains to Kingston, Tenn., reaching there at 8 p. m. Here again their reckless daring was displayed. They entered with drawn pistols and forced a physician to dress John Taylor's wound, and then entering several stores, compelled the clerks to give them several boxes of cartridges. Remounting they proceeded to the densest forests and hid themselves in the remotest recesses. They were familiar with that region, and succeeded in baffling the skill and vigilance of all their pursuers.

A few days afterward Bob Taylor boarded a train at Rockwood, Tenn., and proceeded to Cincinnati and thence to Missouri, where he had a brother living. He had been there scarcely a week when his identity became noised about. At last R. P. Goodal, the sheriff of Lebanon county, succeeded in establishing his identity beyond doubt and determined to capture him. Taylor was in Lebanon, purchasing supplies, and when he boarded the train he was followed by the sheriff and a deputy. A few moments after he had taken his seat the sheriff stealthily crept behind him, and presenting a pistol to his head, commanded him to surrender. The desperado was not thus easily to be overawed, and reached for his weapon, but before he could draw the sheriff fired, and Taylor fell a corpse. The news of his death was received in this city with the wildest joy, and when the corpse arrived 5,000 people met it at the train. It was placed on exhibition the next day, and viewed by nearly 15,000 persons.

Andy and John Taylor, when they were left by Bob, proceeded cautiously overland in the direction of Alabama. They traveled only under cover of darkness and made but five or six miles each day. They went disguised as tramps, and the dare-devils actually passed through this city one evening at 7 o'clock, when two companies of militia were guarding the river for them, and no less than 1,000 persons were scrutinizing every stranger. From this city they proceeded into North Alabama and thence tramped to Memphis and from there proceeded to Missouri, intending to join their brother Bob. When they reached Missouri they heard for the first time of Bob's death. John became very much depressed, and his melancholy, coupled with long exposure and the neglected wound in his arm, proved too much even for his iron constitution. He fell ill at Ballenger's Mill, Mo., and after a painful and wasting sickness of nearly a month, died in great agony. He was buried near that point, and several months afterward the remains were exhumed by the sheriff of this county and identified beyond a doubt.

The death of his two companions in crime left Andy almost despairing. He is but a boy, scarcely twenty, and when he realized his friendless condition his desperation almost drove him to suicide. He left Missouri and began work on a farm at Emporia, Kans. Remorse siezed him and his dejection at last became so great that in a moment of extreme melancholy he confessed all and then attempted to shoot himself, but was prevented. He was at once arrested and placed in close confinement until the Chattanooga officers could be notified. This was quickly done, and the sheriff of this and London county proceeded to Kansas, and, accompanied by his captors, conveyed the prisoner to Nashville. The excitement was so intense in this city that it was feared he would be lynched if taken through Chattanooga, and as a precautionary measure the governor ordered that he be conveyed to Williamsburg, Ky., and thence taken to Knoxville, Tenn., over the mountains in a wagon. This was accordingly done, and he reached the latter city in safety early in April, 1883.

Taylor was carried to London in June for trial. Great difficulty was encountered in procuring a jury. Nearly 1,000 talesmen were summoned before the jury was complete. The court designated Messrs. Dave Nelson and J. W. Weckler counsel for the accused. The line of defense was that the prisoner was a minor at the time and had been persuaded into the deed, but had fired no shots. After a week's trial the case was given to the jury, and in two hours they returned a verdict of murder in the first degree. He appealed to the supreme court. At special request he was brought to this city to be kept in prison until the supreme court convened, to vindicate the good name of Chattanooga, and prove to the governor that this was not a lynching community. When he arrived hundreds called to see him, and all were astonished to behold a beardless, dull-looking youth, instead of the demon they had pictured. He remained quietly in jail here until September, when he was taken before the supreme court. The sentence of the lower court was confirmed He was sentenced to hang Nov. 23.

Alien Land Holders in the United States.

Representative Hopkins of Pennsylvania has been investigating the subject of ownership by aliens of lands in the United States, as a result of which he has drawn up a bill placing restrictions upon such owners. It was ascertained that the earl of Dunraven owned 60,000 in Colorado; the earl of Dunsmore 100,000 acres; a Scotch company of Dundee, 50,000 acres; the Danish vice consul, 50,000 acres in Minnesota; Phil Marshal & Co., of London England, 130,000 acres in Mississippi: another English company, 700,000 in the Yazoo Delta, and 300,000 acres in Texas; Benjamin Newgas, Liverpool, 100,000 acres in Arkansas. These are only a few cases on the list prepared by Congressman Hopkins, and in his bill he proposes to limit the public land which may be acquired or held by aliens within the jurisdiction of the United States, unless the prospective purchaser has made declaration to become a citizen of the United States. Otherwise an alien cannot hold by purchase, grant or devise, and in case he should secure land in excess of 1,000 acres he cannot hold it longer than two years. The penalty for violating the act is declared forfeiture of title and the land to revert to the United States. Aliens are to include all incorporations formed under the laws of any foreign government.

BUTTER AND CHEESE.

Abstract of the Proceedings of the Annual Meeting of the Minnesota Butter and Cheese Association—Addresses and Discussions.

The third annual meeting of the Minnesota Butter and Cheese association was held at Austin, Mower county. The attendance was large, and the proceedings during three-day's session were of considerable interest to farmers, and especially to dairymen. President O. E. Marvin of Rochester presided.

An address of welcome was made by Rev. E. R. Lathrop of Austin, and a response by C. A. Houston of Iowa, who attended the first Minnesota Dairymen's association at Rochester two years ago. He said: "That part of Iowa which had given attention to stock raising and dairying has exceeded every other part in prosperity, as is seen in the comforts, improvements and conveniences of farm life there. We believe that Southern Minnesota, which lies in the great dairy belt of this grand country, is to be lifted up into great prosperity by mere attention to this great interest. In five years more the change from wheat to dairying will be wonderfully apparent."

President Marvin delivered an annual address. He said the growth of this industry during the past few years is marvelous. Single counties in our State that a few years since only made from 50,000 to 100,000 pounds of butter and cheese, annually have increased under its creamery and factory system to 500,000, and in some cases to more than 1,000,000 pounds a year. This has porportionately increased the amount of beef, pork, poultry and eggs produced as these products always increase in the same ratio with butter and cheese. From a reputation of manufacturing only the most common grades of butter and cheese, the product of the Northern dairy has so improved that it is highly complimented and sought after in all the leading markets because of its superior body, texture and flavor.

The solution of the oleomargarine or adulterated product question it seems to me is to produce goods of the highest possible quality and standard; co-operate to make them on the most economical practicable plan; place them on the markets at prices that will guarantee their use by the masses; insist that impure goods shall be sold for what they are, and soon their demand will so diminish that factories must close for want of patronage. To successfully accomplish this the patrons must sustain the manufacturer and be willing that he should realize a fair profit, which will enable him to successfully prosecute his business.

Secretary Rice of Olmsted county made an address in which he spoke of the advantages of paying increased attention to the cow. These are seen in increased thrift, industry, peace, and culture. Olmsted county in four years has doubled her number of cows, also of sheep, and quadrupled her number of hogs; and never, with two exceptions, raised as much wheat as this year. Rochester stores keep hardly any book accounts; $8,000 a month is paid for Olmsted county cream, and three farm mortgages are now paid off where one is put on. Fourteen Olmsted county men have gone to Europe this year to buy stock.

A large volume of statistics were introduced to which brief reference may be made.

The value of this year's butter product in Minnesota, at an average valuation of 30 cents per pound, will exceed $5,300,000, and that of last year was close to $5,000. In 1880 there wasn't a single creamery in the state worthy the name and the one erected at Spring Valley in 1881 was much commented upon. To-day there are seventy sizable creameries or butter factories, and their number is being augmented almost every month. The success of farmers in Northern Iowa, in raising milch cows and selling the product, stimulated interest in the matter in Southern Minnesota and from the Manchester creamery in Iowa, established no longer than 1878, scores have sprung up in both states. The middle and central northern portions of Minnesota are also beginning to follow the example of the more southerly parts, and good judges predict that within the next decade the value of the annual dairy product in Minnesota will exceed ten millions of dollars. The methods employed have been described frequently. A creamery is built in a town or small city in the center of a good grazing country. Farmers with milch cows are supplied with cans of such diameter that an inch of cream therein will make a pound of butter, and are paid by the inch, the price ranging from nineteen to twenty-five cents, though the latter is unusual and regarded very high. The farmers generally acknowledge that they receive more for the cream when sold in this way than they could make if they manufactured it into butter and then sold it. The creameries have wagons and regular routes from which the cream is gathered as often as needed. Few of the farmers have any large herds, the object being to make the dairy interest an adjunct to the regular agricultural pursuits. The steers were raised for beef and enough of the heifers are kept to insure a large enough herd to make the business pay. As the creameries leave the milk on the farms the calves don't have to be killed as formerly and a usual adjunct of the cattle herd is a drove of hogs, to whom the surplus milk is given. Both hogs and cattle require corn for fattening purposes, and it is estimated that in Fillmore the largest dairying county in the state, 65,000 acres were planted in corn last year, as against 57,000 acres in 1882, the latter acreage being largely in excess of that of former years. The creameries do not furnish butter for home consumption, but send their product to the east, or to large home cities like St. Paul and Minneapolis. The making of cheese does not meet with much favor, and the amount manufactured in the state in 1882 was but 247,186 pounds. Cheese factories take all the milk, leaving nothing for fattening calves and hogs.

From advance sheets of Commissioner Malmros' statistics for 1883 it appears that there were 247,000, cows in the state of Minnesota in 1883: butter made in 1882, amounted to 17,736,788.

The number of pounds of butter for 1883 is not given or estimated, but at 71 8 10 pounds to the cow, the yield of 1882, the product for the present year will reach 17,747,954, or more than 600,000 in excess of the product of 1882. Coupled with the above table is a column in which it is stated that there are thirty-three cheese factories in the state,

With the growth of the dairy interest came the interesting query "What is the most profitable breed of cattle for Minnesota's uses?" The question has not been fully settled, since the years of trial have as yet been so few. Many farmers have spent large sums for pure bred bulls, and the improvement in quality is one of the most notable outgrowths of the last few years. Shorthorns, Holsteins, Polled Angus and Jerseys have been brought in, and at the Mankato convention last year Messrs. McGlincy of Minnesota and Curtis of New York were unqualified in their advocacy of the Jerseys as cream givers. They might have quoted the remark of a Pennsylvania owner of a small-framed breed, who averred "You can pick up your Jersey cow and carry her when you want her, but set her down and milk her and it will tire you to carry away the cream." The Polled Angus, with large frames and sturdy constitutions, are regarded highly as beef cattle, and Shorthorns, Holsteins and other breeds have their warm advocates, the predelitions of the owners probably governing their judgment to some extent.

The first paper read was on Creameries and Their Object, by F. A. Richardson of Austin. He said:

These are varied and many.

First—It is to make better butter larger in quantity and more uniform in quality. In proof of this we simply refer to the daily market quotations. Our whole attention is paid to this one branch of industry. New plans and methods are tried constantly. We watch our cream and churn it at the right time. We gain a uniformity and a quantity that 200 or 300 patrons guessing at the condition of the cream cannot reach.

Second—In the wake of better butter comes a better breed of cattle. A farmer is no longer satisfied to milk a cow that does not yield a good flow of reasonably rich milk. The farmers are culling over their herds so as to get larger results from the same number of cows.

Third—The creamery system allows the farmer to keep more stock as the home labor is lightened; can take better care of them, bestow better treatment on them. A patron of a creamery finds out that kindness to his cows pays at the cream gauge.

Fourth—It educates the patrons how and where to set their milk to get the best results.

Fifth—It furnishes the patrons with a market at their own door and pays him his cash, and all the hard labor of making butter is removed.

Sixth—A creamery assists dairyman who are not its patrons by moveing out of their market large quanities of butter which would otherwise be in direct competition with their business.

Seventh—It enables the farmers to raise his calves, swine and poultry in good condition.

Eighth—It brings character, reputation and wealth to the community where they are established. We quote Olmsted county in illustration. Minnesota is the best diary state in the Union, and we need fear no market competition for our creamery products.

An interesting discussion was brought out by this paper, regarding the practical work of gathering cream.

In regard to the handling of milk Mr. B. F. Holmes on this subject said:

First—Select good cow, kind, yellow-skinned, quiet.

Second—Give good, warm stable.

Third—Give her all she can eat and digest. Put in stable summer and winter alike.

Fourth—Milk quickly and strain at once; and set apart from anything that can impart bad odors. Set in deep cans; skim in about twenty-four hours, and stir the whole every time you put cream into the cream tank. He went on to show very vividly the striking contrast between the careless, ignorant dairy farmer without plan or judgment, and the improved dairy farmer who takes due care of every point of his herd, and of his milk and cream. He said 64 to 66 deg. in winter, and 56 to 58 deg. in summer is the proper temperature for churning.

A paper was read by O. C. Gregg of Marshall, How to Make Farming in Minnesota Successful. He said:

The style of farming in this section of Minnesota for the past ten years has not proved it a paying business. Mortgages are stacked up in every county and great prosperity is not apparent. Successful farming is not connected exclusively with grain raising. It must include stock raising. Wheat raising, if successful, must in the future mean to take cheap wheat to the world's market. Our experience in wheat raising is not promising for this section. But Minnesota is the very first as an oat state, second as a rye state, third as a corn state, and in the highest place we must put the production of grasses. Blue grass, timothy and clover are perfectly adapted here. Acre for acre we cannot be beaten in these. We have been striving to raise the most difficult crop, and disregarding those more natural and most profitable.

On the management of creameries C. D. Vernon of Mankato, said:

Successful management, in order to obtain the best results, involves the best means and skill in the manufacture of butter; good financiering, and retaining the highest degree of confidence and good will among patrons.

H. A. Holmes of Chatfield followed on the same subject:

First, must be co-operation of the creamery men with each other. Farmers are coming to recognize the creameries as their best helpers. The difference in weather and station makes a difference in the quantity of butter obtained. Forty-eight to 55 deg. is the proper temperature for raising cream. Ice should not be used in raising cream.

The last point was disputed by Secretary Rice, Mr. Huston and Col. Littler.

Mr. A. P. McKinstry read a paper on the best methods of testing cream. He said, two methods are known to me, which have the past year met with success: First, the test-tube plan; second, the Schach & Balender system. The tube system gives only a solid inch of cream, without reference to its value as a butter maker.

The Schach & Balender plan consists in taking a half inch (56½ cubic inches) of each patron's cream, churning and weighing the butter by itself, thus determining the exact amount of butter he should be paid for. The butter in the cream is in fact what is purchased. The test is, of course, made at the creamery. Any one can make it at home by taking a two-quart fruit jar and putting in a quart of cream and shaking it by hand until the butter comes.

Rev. E. Miller, D. D., pastor of the First Methodist church of St. Paul, gave an address on Mental Culture and Agriculture. An address was made by Col. R. M. Little, so many times re-elected secretary of the National Butter, Cheese and Egg association. His subject was the Importance of Our Dairy Interests. One speaker says: "The cow is the best mortgage lifter in the world." Another said; "There is such a thing as a dairy belt, just as much as there is a No. 1 hard wheat belt, and we are right in the midst of it."

Thursday morning after an inspection of the dairy fair, the association listened to the lecture of Dr. Grange on health of animals. He took up first the cause of abortion, naming among these:

Very cold water in later season before parturition. Frosted food, especially roots. impure water. Excessive muscular exertion and excitement. Animals threatened with abortion should be kept quiet. Sedatives should be administered, such as tincture of laudanum or chloral hydrate, and kept in a carefully ventilated room. If the mother is properly cared for, milking should be stopped six months before the birth of the calf; should be carefully fed, but not made too fat; allowed plenty of outdoor exercise; no surgical operations. After calving, mother kept in a comfortable place for a few days. The calf as soon as born should be attended to. Membranes removed from nose, etc.

Col. Littler has used for eighteen years one pint of wheat flour scalded to a paste for the successful bringing away of the afterbirth. Garget is inflammation of the udder, often accompanying parturition of deep milkers, all quarters or one being affected—result of over-supply of milk. Sometimes result of bad milking. Gland hard, hot and red. Two forms of treatment, constitutional and local. First consists in removing constipation with epsom salts, etc., then give diuretics like saltpetre. Local treatment consists of application of hot water to cause fermentation, or poultice of spent hops, which retain heat and moisture a long time.

There was a discussion on the Schoch & Bolender system of testing cream. A. P. McKinsley and C. A. Houston advocated it, and believed that this would in time prevail. This method is fair to both buyer and producer. A certain quantity of cream does not represent a certain quantity of butter. C. A. Houston then discussed the importance of brand reputation:

Brands in connection with any other good article are very valuable and important. A certain brand of flour sells for twenty-five cents more in Cedar Rapids than any other. The same fact is true of the dairy. Elgin creamery butter established our market price. If any creamery will produce a uniform grade of first-class product, its brand will add to the value, and establish and maintain a reputation.

Col. Littler spoke of the criminality of using another's brand without permission A law should be on every statute book making the false use of brands a penal offense. E. D. Potter, a Minneapolis dealer, spoke of the producer keeping the products up to the brand. Never use your brand on inferior articles. A vigorous discussion next following on butter or cheese, in which Lawrence Dignam, Lansing, said that—

Farmers did not receive a dollar a hundred for their milk by selling to creameries. The cheese factory pays this. He gets his calves well started before cheese manufacturing commences. There is too wide a difference between the price paid for cream and the market price of creamery butter.

President Marvin, who manufactures about one-half of the cheese produced in Minnesota. said:

The average paid for cream in Olmstead county was 18 cents last summer. One hundred pounds of milk makes four inches of cream. Add the values of skim milk for calves and pigs and saving of time. Butter is a necessity. Not one in six eats cheese. Butter making is not liable to be overdone as is cheese making. In thinly settled counties butter is the most profitable. The overproduction of cheese is easy and reduces the market. The price should be fixed for both cheese and butter when either pays best.

C. A. Houston believed in cheese factories and in creameries, too. His factories are fixed up to make both butter and cheese. In June and July they make butter, and let the calves have the skim milk. The rest of the season they turn to cheese. A spirited discussion followed. The general sentiment was that both were profitable in their place.

The committee on change of name recommended a change to Minnesota butter Butter Cheese and Dairy association. Adopted.

The committee on premiums awarded: On Creamery Butter—First premium, F. D. Holmes, Owatonna; second, Marvin & Cammack. The Austin creamery made no entries. Dairy Butter—First premium, S. N. Frisbee; second, A. P. McBride; third, N. J. Leavitt. Roll Butter—First premium, D. B. Vaugh; second, E. P. Spooner. Granulated Butter—First premium, Marvin & Cammack; second, F. D. Holmes. Cherry, cream gatherers; second, Oval Churn company.

In the test made with the Goshen oval churn before the committee, six inches of cream used, temperature 62 deg., churning accomplished in eighteen minutes, producing six pounds of very fine butter.

The committee on nominations for next year reported:

O. E. Marvin, President; O. C. Gregg, vice president; W. C. Rice, secretary and treasurer.

Mr. Marvin positively declined. The committee substituted the name of Col. C. G. Edwards of Spring Valley for president. Adopted as thus amended.

The committee on location reported Austin for the place of meeting next year of this association.

Minnesota butter and cheese association is a pronounced success. Its third annual meeting has fully met the highest expectations of its officers. Far more pretentious societies have attracted less attention and called together a less noted body of practical agriculturists and dairymen.

Among those present were: Col. R. M. Littler, secretary National Butter and Cheese association, Davenport, Iowa; Rev. E. Miller, D. D., St. Paul; Dr. E. A., Grange, University of Michigan; C. A. Villard Steps Down and Out.

On Monday, railroad circles were excited by the semi-official announcement that Henry Villard had resigned the presidency of the Oregon and Transcontinental Company and the Oregon railway company, and was about to give up the presidency of the Northern Pacific to the former President Frederick Billings.

Mr. Villiad refused to be interviewed. Through his secretary he made the explanatory statement that he had been impressed with the conviction that it would not be proper for him to continue as the president of all the companies whose management he has heretofore directed, after the completion of the Northern Pacific railroad as a transcontinental line.

Mr. Frederick Billings has resigned from the Oregon Transcontinental directory, and will take charge of the Northern Pacific railroad again. He abandons the one to save the other. His stock was sold last week, and was the long stock then unloaded. He was disgusted with the way the "blind pool" was conducted, and disagreed with his colleagues on matters of retrenchment as well.

The opinion on the street is that the change is the best thing which could occur for the company's interest and Mr. Billings, the first president, has a better knowledge of the system of roads than any other living man. He is several times a millionaire, and a man in whom the public has confidence. His policy will be conservative, and in favor of retrenchment. "The change cannot be for the worse, in any event," said a prominent operator.

Flour Mill and Elevator Burned at Eau Claire.

On the night of the 12th the Eau Claire Lumber company's flouring mill, located on the south side of the Eau Claire river, oppotite their steam lumber mill, was discovered on fire. An alarm was promptly given and the fire department answered, but the flames had gained such rapid headway that all attempts to extinguish them proved fruitless. In a few moments after the blaze was discovered the entire mill, which was of a combustible character, was one sheet of flames, throwing out an intense heat unbearable for a long distance in either direction. The mill contained the latest improved roller and other machinery, and was one of the finest manufacturing establishments of the kind in the Northwest. At the time of the fire the mills contained a large quantity of wheat, feed and about forty tons of flour, sacked and ready for delivery, all of which with the structure, is a total loss. From the mill the fire communicated with the elevator east, nearly adjoining, which, with 30,000 bushels of wheat and 5,000 bushels of oats, etc., proved a total loss. The loss will probably reach $65,000, on which there was only a small insurance.

A Dead-beat's Frightful Death.

Pittsburg Dispatch; Blowing out a locomotive boiler is done by turning a cock that lets the water and steam out directly under the cab. While one of the express trains was rushing along in the night the engineer found it necessary to "blow her out," and opening the cock a most unearthly scream went up from under his feet. Jumping to the air-brake and reversing the engine the train was quickly stopped, and all hands rushed back to ascertain the meaning of that unusual cry. There on the track, torn to pieces by the wheels and scalded beyond recognition, was the remains of a man who had been stealing a ride on the brake beam of the engine tank, so as to be near the heat of the fire-box, and had received the full charge of steam and hot water on his body, and been blown from his insecure seat without a moment's warning into eternity, adding one more to that great list of "missing."

New Officers of the Senate.

The republican caucus, on the 13th inst., after an animated contest nominated Gen. Anson G. McCook for secretary, Anthony, Don Cameron, Bowen and Palmer were absent and Mahone not voting. Those who voted for Gorham are understood to be Logan, Cullom; McMillan, Sabin, Conger, Janes, Blair, Sawyer, Angus, Cameron, VanWyck, Sherman, Frye, Hill, Dolph and Miller—15 to 16 for McCook and 4 for Harrison's man. On the second ballot Gorham lost three, who are understood to be Sherman, Sawyer and Frye. Gen. McCook is a brother of the famous McCook family of Ohio, several of whom were generals.

There was no contest over the election of the rest of the "old ticket," as follows: Charles W. Johnson of Minnesota, chief clerk; James Riceung, Pennsylvania, executive clerk; Rev. E. E. Huntly, of the Metropolitan M. E. Church, Washington, formerly of Wisconsin, chaplain; and Col. W. P. Courday of North Carolina, surgeant-at-arms. A revolution was adopted unanimously to retain the wounded soldiers now on the rolls of the senate in their positions.

Daring Robbery at Luverne, Minn.

J. B. Shawrer, a stock-buyer of Luverne, Rock county, Minn., was slugged by an unknown man on the 17th and robbed of currency and drafts amounting to $1,200. Mr. Shawrer went to his barn about 8 o'clock to water his horses, and as he opened the sliding door between the carriage room and the stable, he was struck a terrible blow across the top of his head, and at the same moment the lantern he carried was smashed and the light extinguished. A struggle ensued, in which Mr. Shawrer received another heavy blow above his left ear, which felled him to the floor insensible. The robber then rifled his victim's pocket and fled, About half an hour later Mr. Shawrer recovered his senses and succeeded in getting back to his house. A physician was summoned and the wounds although very severe, were pronounced not necessarily dangerous. The matter was placed in the hands of Sheriff Gillham, who made diligent search for the robber but without success.

The Hon. Knute Nelson's pine land bill don't seem to suit the Minneapolis pine land ring a bit and already their grumbling begins to fill the air. We are told that they will bring to bear all of their force to kill it and if the people intend to get that pine this session of Congress they must do all they can to strengthen their representative, Mr. Nelson. Meetings should be held in every city and village in the Northwest, resolutions in favor of the bill passed and sent to Mr. Nelson, every man who feels interested should write to each of our representatives in Congress urging the importance of the bill and urging them to aid in its passage. The pine land ring does not like the bill because it provides for putting the pine on the market in such a manner as will allow this upper country to get the full benefit from it without being obliged to pay Minneapolis prices and it also provides that Uncle Sam will get his just pay for the timber. The ring would like it to come in under the homestead and preemption laws in order to enable them to gobble it up at minimum figures. What this country needs is that Mr. Nelson's bill should pass and that bill is supported by thousands of names signed to the petitions that have gone in. They should be supplemented by mass meetings and by letters from the prominent men of this country. We need that pine and it looks now as though we should have to work hard to get it.

Wheat Grading.

Showing the actual steal on frozen wheat we have another illustration from Red Lake Falls. Clerk of the court elect, Mr. E. A. Columbus brought a load of his wheat to the elevators at Crookston for which he has offered only thirty cents per bushel. He refused to accept that and took the same wheat to the Terrebonne mills and had it ground into flour. This flour he sold at $2.75 per cwt. which netted him one dollar per bushel for his wheat. He was indebted to a prominent firm in this city in a small amount and offered to bring them some of the flour which they could take and try and if they could use it apply it on account. One of the members of the firm told us that the flour was just as good in every particular as any straight grade flour he had ever used that had been made in Minneapolis. If this one example is not enough to convince all who are inclined to think that the millers are the salvation of this country, that they are an organized set of swindlers the country is chuck full of other cases that will. We have given many cases of wrongs committed by this millers association and they are not wholly unsupported by evidence to prove our assertions. In many cases we have the sworn affidavits of the farmers to prove them and those affidavits, when the proper times arrives will appear in judgment against the intolerable monopoly that is draining the resources of this country.

Another Case In Point.

Grand Forks Herald.

As there is nothing like specific facts to bring home to the sense of the general public the gross and outrageous injustice being done to the producers of this country by the wheat and elevator rings, we take pleasure from time to time in furnishing those details in order to convince the business men who depends on the farmers, as well as the farmers themselves, of the substantial nature of those grievances which we have partially ventilated. Yesterday Mr. John A. Lapham, who lives six miles west of Grand Forks, came into the city with a load of wheat. He sent his boy over to Pillsbury & Hulbert's elevator to deliver it, when the boy informed him that they would only allow No. 2, at 73 cents a bushel. He hastened over, and though part of the grain was already in the hopper, had it re-bagged, and drove his load to the roller mills. The grain inspector at the roller mills readily took it as No. 1 Hard, and Mr. Wybrant paid him his cash at 80 cents per bushel. Had he sold to the elevator at their rating, 60 bushels would have been worth $43.80. As it was, he received $48, and just escaped being robbed of $4.20.

Little Falls Transcript: The cases of J. H. Rhodes vs. the Northern Pacific Railroad company for damages sustained by the refusal of the company to grant him cars in which to ship wheat, have been decided in favor of the plaintiff, and judgments granted for $90 and $93. (There were two suits, and the complaint and answer in one was used for both) The answer as published in these columns was somewhat amended before the trial, the company claiming that they had caused to be established a warehouse at this point for the purpose of handling grain, and said warehouse was prepared to receive and handle all grain which come to this market at the rates fixed by statute, and that the company was not obliged to ship grain from any other warehouse.

St. Hilaire Spectator: Messrs. Chas. Robbecke, J. A. Feord and C. A. Wood, left yesterday on a few weeks trapping and shooting expedition up the Thief River. They will follow up the Thief until they reach Moose river, one of its tributaries, and about twenty miles from the mouth of the latter river they will build their shanty and get ready to slay the moose and elk by the wholesale. We understand that they have made arrangements at Crookston and Grand Forks to dispose of all the game they bring back.

St. Hilaire Spectator: School opened on Monday last, with Mr. Harry Ives at the helm, and a fair attendance of scholars. There are however, yet remaining in the district, a goodly number of children who should be, but are not, sent to school. Parents who have children of eligible age, and do not permit them to attend school when they have the opportunity, do them a grevious wrong. It is a greater sin to rob your children of their education, then it is to rob your neighbor's barn of his horse.

The Wheat Question.

Grafton Herald: The discontent among the farming class at what they call the exertion of the monopolists, including, of course, the Minneapolis, Millers' Association, the Manitoba road and all others concerned is fast crystallizing towards organized effort. Several influential, intelligent farmers, who are neither hot heads or fools, believe that a wrong is perpetrated on the grading of wheat and are holding communication with others in Walsh, Pembina and Grand Forks towards organizing and devising means to right their wrongs. Whether the result will be crystalization of course we are unable to say, but whether rightfully or wrongfully, they believe themselves seriously injured, and we should not be suprised in the near future to see a repetition of the Granger movements of a few years ago in Minnesota, Iowa and Wisconsin repeated in North Dakota.

Nor is it by any means confined to North Dakota. It is in full swing on the other side of the line, and the "truly loyal" farmers of Manitoba are just indignant and just as excited as their brethern south of the line. Farmers. clubs have been formed through the Northwestern territory who fiercely and vehemently denounce the Canadian Pacific railroad and all other monopolies; indeed, one old farmer has gone so far as to publicly declare that if their wrongs were not righted in Ottawa they would look to Washington. Such a general upheaval and complaint must have some ground for existence, and if properly conducted and organized cannot help but become a booming question in the near future. Whether competing lines of railroads and elevators are possible, or if possible that they would solve the problem, we are not prepared to say, but there is one thing certain, they would do no damage and might certainly do great good. If farmers believe they are wronged let them organize intelligently and no power can prevent them from winning their rights, at least on this side of the line. Isolated, individual action will accomplish nothing.

Bathgate Sentinel: Mr. E. Moeckel, a representative of the Valley Roller Mills, of Crookston, Minn., was in town last week, working up trade for their brands of flour. Messrs. Lee & Herrick, the proprietors, have as fine a mill as any in the northwest and are turning out flour second to none ground in the Red River Valley. With abundant water power, the latest and most expensive machinery, and ample capital, they can lay their full patent brand and others down here in competition with the mill now supplying us. We have eaten bread baked from the flour and know whereof we speak when we say it is as good as anybody can wish. One of our firms will probably handle it.

Referring to Mr. C.S. Hulbert's letter on the wheat question the Todd County Argus says: "The letter explains several points, but it does not explain why the company tries so hard to crush out competing buyers. If they mean to give the farmers all that the price of wheat will allow they can surely stand a little competition by men who are not prepared to handle wheat at so little expense as they can The elevator company made every effort to have the railroad company refuse cars to Mr. Fisher here so as to drive him out and shut off competition. It costs Mr. Fisher two cents more per bushel to handle wheat than it does the elevator, so it readily appears that such competition could easily be driven out of the field by the elevator simply paying two cents more for the wheat, and give the same grades. That would end it quickly.

Taking 50,000 bushels as the total wheat receipts at this place during the year this saving of two cents per bushel in handling would yield the elevator the sum of $1000. Mr. Fisher has bought twelve thousand bushels of wheat since Oct. 25th and on this amount the elevator could save $240 in handling.

When Mr. Hatton, the agent at the elevator here, started out he paid all the wheat was worth, but when he came to ship the wheat it was rejected and he lost over a hundred dollars. When he cut down on the grade so that it would stand at Minneapolis it was so low that farmers could do much better elsewhere and no wheat came in town Mr. Hatton was not to blame in the least, as he has done the very best he could. The trouble has been with the grading at Minneapolis. Had not Mr. Fisher or some other independent buyer entered the field the farmers would not have sold their wheat here which proves that without competition the elevator company does not pay what wheat is actually worth."

A FARMERS' CLUB.

A correspondent to the Pembina Pioneer-Express gives his views upon the situation, urging the formation of a farmers' club, as follows:

In late issues of the press of this region one may notice floating paragraphs concerning the necessity of concerted action among the farmers of the wheat producing regions, in order to protect themselves against the rapacious monopolists which are now sapping the life-blood from the hard-working yeomanry who are toiling to develop the great Northwest and establish homes and gain a livelihood for themselves and their families.

It seems to the writer that such action must be had, if we would avoid being swallowed by the anaconda which now has its stifling coils around the infant communities of this naturally fertile region. The combination of railroad and elevator monopolies, having a tacit or actual agreement among themselves, backed by ample capital, renders the farmer, unless indeed he be a capitalist as well, powerless to control the handling, marketing, or grading of his productions. All he can do in most cases, is simply to bring his wheat to the elevator and accept the price and grade offered. The existence of the independent buyer and shipper, which is the only safeguard the producer has, is practically prohibited by the regulations of the existing combinations. It is notorious that the cry of "frosted wheat" has been made the pretext for the perpetration of a gigantic steal on the part of the Millers Association, which has without doubt purchased large amounts of excellent milling wheat at prices far below its intrinsic value. From the profits of this speculation, doubtless some few mills will be erected next year, while the poor farmers will find themselves harassed by debt, or to be closed out by the sheriff.

All other industries, trades and professions have organizations to further their interests and objects. The farmers as a class, have no cohesion, union or organization. The manufacturers combine to secure rates from the railroads and get more than their share; and the deficit is made up by bleeding the helpless farmers. The railroads fix their arbitrary rates and unreasonable regulations and State and Territorial law as it now stands is powerless to prevent it. The fact is that the law of the land is well established by the highest tribunal in the country, the Supreme Court of the U. S. (in the well known "Granger cases") to the effect that the people have the power to regulate the charges made by these quasi public corporations, which have received valuable franchise from the public. In most of the Western States, depending as they do on agricultural productions; attempts, and successful ones too, have been made to control railroad and warehouse charges and regulations by State authority. In Illinois, Iowa or Wisconsin, if a single farmer feels aggrieved by any action of a railroad, or warehouse man, all he has to do is to submit the facts to the State board of railroad and warehouse commissioners, and the matter is at once investigated, and if wrong, is set right. The whole power of the State is brought to bear on an overcharge involving only a few cents and the knowledge that this will be done, is a powerful factor in preventing abuses, discrimination and over-charge, on the part of those who otherwise, as now in this region, possess the power to take a toll from the produce which leaves him only a beggarly pittance for his expenditure, labor and risk. Compared with this wholesale robbery, Irish landlordism and other abuses, about which the world is constantly hearing, sinks into comparative insignificance, and it will continue until the people arise in their might and put an end to the thing by asserting those rights of which they undoubtedly are possessed.

Now, Mr. Editor, "in union is strength." Individuals can do nothing to right this gigantic wrong. Legislation is demanded—but its passage is prevented by the fact that the railroads owns the Legislature, or are able by pecuniary or other influence, to prevent any laws being passed, as was evidently the case in Minnesota at the last session. There is a demand in the markets of the world for our No. 1 hard, of the production whereof we hold a monopoly. Mills in Wisconsin, Iowa, Illinois, Missouri and even Rochester, are anxious to buy our wheat, but the Minneapolis Miller's Association has in a great measure thus far been able to prevent any considerable amount of it going past their doors; thus they expect to do in the future. They will succeed, unless we arouse ourselves and fight the devil with fire by bringing to bear an organization of sufficient consequence so checkmate their piratical scheme.

In the judgement of the writer, the following plan, if carried out, would lead to most important results. Let the press of this region agitate this matter and invite communications upon the subject. At a suitable time let a convention be called to take into consideration the formation of an organization to be known as the Northwestern Wheat Growers Association, or similar title, membership in the same to be limited to those who make this business their main one. Let the business of the association be in the hands of an executive committee, the actual work being done by a secretary, whose business it shall be to keep thoroughly posted in all matters relating to the interests of the association and its members. The subjects of grades, freight rates, warehouse charges, etc, should be thoroughly looked into. Let documents be distributed, and public sentiment thus educated, in order that in due time candidates for the Legislature may be elected, independent of all party considerations, and thus proper legislation can be secured. The association could form a medium of communication between the millers of different parts of the country and the producers; could secure concessions from the railroads; and in general, make the interests of its members its own. If properly managed, it seems to the writer, that such an organization could hardly fail to accomplish great good in a business way. Incidentally too, it might be made very useful in procuring the best qualities of seed grain; and at its meetings many questions relative to the best methods of cultivating wheat, and other matters might be discussed with great profit.

Such Mr. Editor, is the plan which seems to the writer the most feasible and it would seem to be a perfectly practical one. Should the suggestion meet the views of the public, I mon discuss the subject farther.

Deep or Shallow Which?

Farmers Tribune.

From the time of the introduction of the plow, as far as we know, farmers have held different opinions in regard to deep and shallow plowing. At the gathering of the prominent farmers the other day, west of the big woods, in Glencoe, a controversy sprung up in relation to this question, some contending that deep plowing produces the best results, while others held that shallow plowing was the best. The discussion was confined to land that was occupied with wheat. We do not suppose that there is any question as to corn land, or to potatoes, and in fact to all land, that is to be occupied by other crops than wheat. We mean of course as far as the soil in the Northwest is concerned. This is a matter we have made a good many experiments with; made them on different soils, and we have always found deep plowing produced the best results, and we have no doubt, in fact we are morally certain, that if the practice should be universally observed by the farmers of plowing their land deeper than they do now, it would add annually millions bushels of grain to the crops in the Northwest. The greatest loss in this particular is in the Red River Valley, where, as far as we recently examined in the neighborhood of Casselton, the average depth plowed would not exceed three inches. If the farmers in that vicinity could only be persuaded to add three inches more—and turn up some of their virgin soil—it would at least add from five to ten bushels more of wheat to every acre cultivated. Deep cultivation of land is best in dry weather and best in wet weather; the best in all seasons, especially after three or four years of constant cropping, and the sooner the farmers adopt this system the better it will be for them.

Frank V. Lytle lost $380 or $387 in gold on Saturday last. He had just received returns from a carload of No. 1 Hard Scotch Fife wheat, that had been sold in Minneapolis for 64 cents per bushel and had the money in a sack marked "Merchants Bank, Crookston Minn.," marked on it. He had it in Carman the last he knows of it. Upon reaching home he soon missed it and returned to search for it but so far has failed to find it. The finder will receive a suitable reward upon its return to the owner.

If the Millers' Association are running their wheat business solely in the interests of the farmers why do they try so hard to get and keep absolute control of the wheat business of the Northwest when the farmers are all desirous of having an open market? The elevator companies all claim to be under the control of the millers, who have their own inspector who one day grades the same wheat one grade and the next another, regulating the price of wheat by the supply on hand without reference to eastern prices, paying a higher price when wheat is not coming in fast enough and a lower price when it is coming in too rapidly for them. Why do they object to farmers having cars to ship to any market they choose and arrange it so that a farmer can not get a car to ship his wheat in without paying the elevator company 2½ cents per bushel even though his wheat never goes into the elevator? Even the millers must admit that the present system affords a grand opportunity for large steals that could not exist on an open market. If they are sincere in their professions that they prefer to see farmers get as much for their wheat as possible let them prove it by granting an open market. But their actions and their professions fail to correspond and we believe that the only relief the farmers can ever expect to gain they must make for themselves and the surest means lies in a railway to Duluth. Let us arise and build.

Washburn is astraddle of his old hobby again. He has introduced his bill for colonizing all of the balance of the Indians in the world on the White Earth Reservation. Perhaps that is a method suggested by the millers association to recompense us for the wheat crop annually stolen from us, if so they entirely mistake our nature up here. We are not in the least hoggish in the matter and do not want to absorb the Indian business to the detriment of the rest of mankind, anyhow we don't want to swap our wheat for Indians. The fact of the matter seems to be that poor Lo is in some way in the way of some Minneapolis scheme and he must be got out of the way but we heartily protest against his being palmed off on this country like that. No, gentlemen, keep your Indians and pay us a reasonable price for our wheat.

Who Grades the Wheat?

From the Wahpeton Times.

We have never happened to notice such a wide spread disposition among the farmers to find fault with the grade of their wheat, as is the case this fall. One scarcely picks up a newspaper in which he does not see complaint in one form or another. One man says he was offered so and so at such a place, went over the way and received so and so, several cents more per bushel for his grain than the first buyer offered. The first then calmly remarks the second did not know wheat when he saw it. Then stories are told showing how buyers are cut short by the eastern market placing a lower grade on grain than the first buyer allowed compelling the first buyer to make the deficiency good.

The producer is put to a good deal of hard work and expense during the year in his production, and is naturally anxious, as is every business man in the country, that he receives all it is worth; but when he drives up to an elevator, and pours his wheat into the scales, thinking that his hard earnings are going into a lottery, there are anything but satisfactory imaginations passing through his mind. A farmer who has raised wheat for ten, fifteen or twenty-five years naturally imagines he knows something about wheat, and we presume he does. When he takes exceptions, who is he to appeal to?

Who is responsible for the grade placed upon the wheat? We presume that if the matter was simmered down, the great millers and wheat kings of the east would say it is worth what it will bring in the markets and not any more. You must take our grade and price or find another market. Where is the means that will prove to the farmer the local buyer pays all he can and that the wheat king, if he virtually does the grading, gives full grade. We presume the most effectual remedy would be found in holding the great body of wheat up as a prize and turn it into the channel that offered the best inducements. It would require calm judgement and a marvelously clear foresight in many directions to manage this important and difficult feat. Farmers would have to unite them as they never united before. They would have to give their notes payable in January instead of November. Great revolutions are being made these days, and it may be possible for the farmer, by united action, to find out who grades his wheat.

It Might Have Been Serious.

Wednesday morning David Sulzbach, of East Grand Forks, accompanied by his brother Moses, went to Fishers Landing to drum up business. Their conveyance was a livery rig. Everything went as merrily as a bee in quest of honey, untill the return trip was commenced, when a trifling incident happened which has soured David and his brother Mose on sleighing. It appears that Mr. Sulzbach is color-blind, and found it impossible at times to keep the road. During one of these digressions from the road the horse got over his depth in a snow drift, and both the gentlemen were tipped out, while the horse made for Mallory at a gait that would have pleased Vanderbilt. In the excitement which followed, David lost sight of the fact that the thermometer was below zero, and as a result of his carelessness had both ears badly frozen. He and his brother walked to Mallory, distant some four miles, and were, kindly cared for by some good people, who induced them to remain all night and the greater part of yesterday, while the frozen ears were properly thawed out and doctored. The horse was stopped at Mallory, doing no further damage than smashing the shafts. Last evening both brothers reached home, looking careworn and tired.—East Grand Forks Courier.

Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator Co.

To the Editor of the Plaindealer:

St. Thomas, Dec. 28, 1883.

In the last issue of your valuable weekly paper I notice a card from the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator Co. in regard to their relationship with the Minneapolis Millers' Association, claiming the same relation to them as the Northwestern, Northern Pacific and Starrett elevator companies.

Bearing the same relation to the Millers' Association as the other elevator companies will not for a moment excuse the P. & H. Co. for the outrages and stealings of the agents of that company on farmers. Whether the elevator companies, the Millers' Association of the Minneapolis & Manitoba road is at fault is a hard matter to say and it matters not to farmers so long as they cannot help themselves. They must submit to the rulings of the organizations.

Mr. Pillsbury claims that his elevator business is perfectly legitimate and conducted on true business principles and not for the purpose of oppressing the people. If this is the platform of the company their agents fail to connect with the purpose. Speaking in behalf of the farmers of North Dakota I contend we are crushed and oppressed by a monopoly that if not broken up will prove the entire destruction to this country in a short time. Poor people coming into this country are laboring under many difficulties. They will work and toil for one or two years living in hopes of being able with the crop to pay their honest debts and purchase the necessaries of life, but how many are disappointed. For example, a farmer will hitch his team up to his load of wheat, and in many cases in Pembina and Walsh counties, he has forty miles to drive. He sometimes, owing to the rush, must wait two days to get unloaded; his load is inspected; wheat tests 60 pounds to the bushel, but it grades No. 1, 2, 3 and often No. 4. Out of the receipts he pays his hotel bill, his expenses back and forth, and what has he left? Comparatively nothing. Is this justice? Could the monopoly help our grievance if they wished? I say yes. I know of a party at East Grand Forks who took his wheat to the elevator there and was offered 40 cents per bushel for it but did not sell it. He hired a car and shipped his wheat to Minneapolis and after paying all expenses netted 71½ cents per bushel for his wheat.

Dakota don't provide us with a law to force the railroad companies to provide us with cars to ship our grain. And the elevator companies will boast of legitimate business. It is a common occurrence here at Auburn for the farmers to leave half their load here and take the other half to Grafton. And why? Simply because the inspector here will give the farmer a grade, say No 1, and when the load is half off he will change his mind and call it No. 2. In many cases the grain is taken to Grafton and sold for No. 1 hard. Some of them get so discouraged that they almost give up the absurd idea of paying their debts. Some are holding their wheat expecting to get better prices and better grades, and borrow money on it. But it is "out of the frying-pan into the fire" with them. Money leaners get hold of them and take advantage of their circumstances and make them a loan at three or four per cent. a month, and what is the result? Elevator companies might answer.

Our bountiful North Dakota cannot stand this very long. The farmer is the bone and sinew of this great wheat belt and under the circumstances the majority cannot exist. If any country ever needed railroad competition this one does, and also an eastern market for our wheat. A RICHMOND FARMER.

A friend of mine, who has been for many years connected with an educational institution, recently handed me this brief article. Its charges are grave, and if its conclusions are correct, there is abundant work for County Superintendents to do. I should be glad to receive personal letters from teachers regarding its statements.

JEROME ALLEN,
St. Cloud State Normal School.

A Reform Necessary.

Of over two hundred students passing examination to enter a certain prominent school during the past two years, not more than one per cent. could explain clearly multiplication and division of fractions. After having been for several years in close connection with common schools, I will say that I have never known one in which the most simple principles of education are not continually violated. Here is an instance: "First the particular, and then the general." This great defect accounts for the multitude of people with untrained reasoning faculties. In most of our schools, the teachers gives the child a rule, and tells him to work by it. The chances are that the child will never comprehend the truth involved, and never see the need of so doing. If he should, he must get back to the particular first. What consummate nonsense it is to attempt to present a subject wrong end first! What time is wasted! What injury is done!

W. S.

Rev. Petroleum V. Nasby (D. R. Locke) will travel through the Southern States during the fall and winter for the purpose of writing a series of letters to his papar, the Toledo Blade, his impressions of the great South. The million readers of the Blade who have read "Nasby in Exile," (Nasby's Letters from Europe,) will appreciate how the subject will be handled. Everybody is invited to send for a speciment copy. See advertisement in another column.

The farmers in the northern border counties insist that a difference of twenty-three or twenty-four cents in the price they are offered for wheat when it is allowed to pass at its proper grade, and the quotations at St. Paul and Minneapolis argues unfair treatment by the railroad and the Millers' Association. They can't understand why it should cost twenty cents to ship a bushel of wheat less than 350 miles to St. Paul, while it costs only fifteen cents for the 900 miles from Chicago to New York. Perhaps if it could be explained to them that they don't understand the mysteries of running a railroad they would be satisfied and give up the attempt to build elevators of their own, and secure competing lines of road.—St. Paul Globe.

The Farmers' Grievances.

Grand Forks Daily Herald.

Now that the business men of Grand Forks who suffer indirectly to almost as great a degree from any cause which tends to reduce the farmer's income, to limit his resources, and to hamper his capital, have entered in earnest upon the investigation of the causes which have led to the present condition of public feeling, with a view to devising and applying a remedy, we would suggest that at the next meeting of the Chamber of Commerce, the agricultural interests in the different township organizations be invited to correspond with the Chamber, with a view to eliciting evidence of the unjust and oppressive transactions by the wheat rings, and also to an ultimate general conference or convention, embodying the farmers of the surrounding country and the business men of Grand Forks, to be held in this city, to discuss these grievances and to protest against the outrageous exactions to which the people have been and are being subjected. Such a convention might be held immediately after the holidays, and while it would be too late to be of any immediate advantage as the mischief for this season is already done, it could organize public sentiment for an united fight by every legal means that can be tested against the illegal oppressions of the monopolists, and prepare the way to secure the election of a people's legislature, pledged to deprive these corporations of every immunity and exemption they now enjoy, and to compel them to pay their fair share of the public burdens, as well as to give to the public all those impartial facilities for carriage of freight, which their charter and the statutes of the territory contemplate.

Nasby's Paper

THE

Toledo Weekly Blade.

CIRCULATION 115,000.

This vast circulation is because the Blade is a paper for the whole country. It is not thrown together, but every line of it is edited by competent hands. It is a complete epitome of the news of the week, and whoever reads the Blade carefully, needs nothing else to be well informed as to what the world is doing. Editorially the Blade has made a proud record. It has an opinion on everything that effects the people of the country, and it expresses it Loldly, fearlessly and forcibly. As good as the Blade has been in the past years, we shall make it better than ever in the year to come.

Among the features for the coming year will be the regular "Nasby Letters," two serials by Nasby, entitled "Nasby in Exile," and "Nasby in the South," a serial story by Ernest Warren, entitled "Court and Camp;" a serial by John McElroy, author of Andersonville, "Reminiscences of an Army Mule;" a serial written for the Blade by an Austrian Nobleman; besides our regular departments, "Household," "Answers to Correspondents" "Camp Fire," etc., etc. We publish all the news and latest corrected markets.

Politically the Blade will continue an exponent of true Republicanism, believing that the best interests of the country demand the continuance of its control in the hands of the party that represents the highest and most advanced ideas.

THE RUM POWER.

The Blade will fight this monster iniquity with all the power it possesses and in every way possible. The Blade holds the liquor traffic to be a greater curse than slavery, and a thousand times more dangerous to the country.

We ask the co-operation of every well-wisher of the Republic that our work may be effective. We ask every Republican in the United States to assist in extending the circulation of the Blade, especially among those of the Republican party who believe as we do in the necessity of Pulverizing the Rum Power. We want the Blade in as many families as possible this winter, that it may be read before the excitement of a political campaign, giving it time for its truths to take root in the minds of its readers.

THE WEEKLY BLADE, $1.00 a year, postpaid to everybody. Those preferring may receive the Blade Three Months by remitting 30 cents, or clubs of three months trial subscribers, of not less than four, 25 cents each.

OUR GREAT ART OFFER.

A $10.00 Steel Engraving for $1. Write us for a specimen copy of the Weekly Blade, which will give full particulars of this the greatest offer ever made by any publisher. We send specimen copies of the Blade free to any address. We want as many addresses as possible to send Specimen Copies to. Write a postal card asking for a Specimen for yourself, and send us the names of all your neighbors. We want to send out a half-million Specimen Copies within the next month. The Grand Jury in their report state they find the county jail in good shape and well kept. They find the county officers in good shape and well kept but lacking in sufficient facilities for keeping the county records in the same condition and recommend that the Register be supplied with a safe at once. They recommend taking down the bridge at East Grand Forks and moving the structure up the river a bit to some more convenient point.

Mr. C. S. Hurlbert, manager of the P. & H. Elevator Company is evidently riled at the good people of Grand Forks, and in a very touching letter to the Herald last week, threatens to remove the P. & H. elevator from G. F. and leave that unfortunate city out in the cold. They have our sympathy. That letter seems to us the height of boyish foolishness as it is an open secret in Grand Forks that the P. & H. Co., have had orders from the railroad company for some time to move their elevator as it interferes with the company's yard room and they will have to move it by spring anyhow.

During the past week we have been much encouraged by receipt of many subscriptions by parties in arrears. All these little reminders of the good will of our patrons are duly cherished and will enable us to appear soon in a new dress which we think the JOURNAL is justly entitled to, as the old garment is pretty well worn out in the service of the people. We have received so many responses to our recent hints about payments of over-due subscriptions that we have decided to delay sending out statements for a week or so to enable all who object to the reminders in form of due bills to get around with their past due subscriptions. We will again urge upon our patrons the importance of this matter to us, reminding them of our need of new type and mildly suggest that we need our money at this time very much and would like to see it coming more rapidly. Our patrons who have promptly paid us as well as all who have not can do us an especial favor by calling attention of all of their friends who do not have THE JOURNAL to the efforts we are making to obtain an open market and inviting them to join us in the good work by sending in their subscriptions to THE JOURNAL. The work is an arduous one, needs money to make it successful, deserves and should receive the earnest support of all interested in the welfare of this county. Soon after New Years we shall send a statement of account to all in arrears and trust that all will be able to respond cheerfully.

A social hop will be given at Ericsson's Hall on Monday evening, Dec. 31st. 1883. This was intended for a mrsquerade but the non-arrival of the masks prevented.

Mrs. Osten Larson made her husband a nice Christmas present of a fine lusty boy on Christmas day. Larson feels so proud over the present that he has not showed up since.

Mr. Sewall P. Norton showed us a sample of the celebrated Saskatchenon wheat that he had just received from the Pioneer Press office. It is a fine looking sample but we suppose by the time Norton gets the proceeds of it to the millers market they will be ready to grade it blue stem same as they did his Scotch Fife this fall.

What does it profit this country if we can raise the best wheat in the world and can not make any profit therein? The fact that a monopoly exists that is consuming the profits of his country is a serious drawback to immigration, so serious that the country will be ruined unless the monopoly is broken up. We need an open market wherein all take an equal chance then we can recommend foreign capital to seek investment here. Let us have an open market.

Farmers, while we are in the investigation business let us not forget the part we have to play in it. Let us review our own work and see if we could not by better cultivation and better seed have raised more bushels per acre. Let us resolve in the future to use every endeavor to better our crops and our yields, raise more stock and more everything else that we need and less wheat. If only one half the acreage intended for wheat next season should be sown and properly worked there would be more money for the farmers and less expenses. Think it over and see if you can not help matters some yourselves.

An interviewer from the P-P has elicited from Gov. Hubbard that he, (the Governor) is informed that petitions are being circulated asking for calling the Legislature together, but, he complacently adds that the Governor says he does not see the necessity for it. Well, candidly, we do not know as we can see any use in calling the same body of men together who have once acted upon the very question and refused to grant it but we certainly should like to see a more gracious spirit manifested by our chief Executive than the P-P, interviewer credits him with. When the grasshoppers devastated the land the Legislature and the chief Executive hastened to the relief of the poor settler and expended thousands in the grand work, and lo! a worse than grasshopper invasion is here and our honored chief Executive manifests a disposition to turn the cold shoulder to our reasonable requests before they are yet made known through the petitions. Perhaps, through the vague ideas of the originators of just how relief could best obtained the petitions may not represent the case in a sufficiently strong light, but they are none the less deserving of consideration and it would pay our officials in power to inquire into the merits of the case before they decide to turn the cold shoulder upon our distress. The temper of our people has not been sweetened by the doses the millers monopoly has forced them to swallow and there will be a day of reckoning some time. In that day the people will be very liable to remember who stood by them in this trouble and who did not. This is no boy play but a sober, earnest matter of business that can not be got rid of by quietly ignoring and we are greatly mistaken in the character of our chief Executive if he attempts to avoid the question in any such a cavilierly manner.

Mr. A. A. Olds has established a broom factory in this city and is prepared to supply the trade in that useful article. Samples may be seen and orders left at Hack & Gallasch's on Main street.

A DIRGE.

With pallid cheeks and wringing hands,
And dusky garments sad and sere,
The dreary winds from Northern lands
Have come to sob at Autumn's bier:
Upon her robe of brilliant dyes,
Behold, in chilly splendor lies
The tribute of a frozen tear.

Come, Winter, come and drop the pall
That only thou know'st how to spread:
In tender silence let it fall
In flawless folds from foot to head;
Within our heart's most sacred shrine,
And guarded by a love divine,
Shall live the memory of the dead!

THE HOUSE IN THE MIRROR.

It was late one winter evening. The snow was falling in thick, fast-coming flakes, making a white curtain that was perpetually being let down between heaven and earth. The storm was carrying on wild sport around the house, shaking the windows, beating against the thick walls, and murmuring in deep hollow tones in the chimneys. It was a night for warm, cosy, substantial indoor comfort, and such I resolved to make it.

At the period of which I am writing I am still a young man, and was practising successfully as a doctor in a town in the west of England—a tolerably large, busy county town which lies near the borders of both Devonshire and Somersetshire. I was unmarried, and was living with an old housekeeper and one servant girl, who helped her by turns, now above stairs, now below, with complacent submission, because the semi-blindness and deafness of the good lady made interviews with her true swain, the butcher's boy, in the scullery not practicable but easy. On the evening in question I had come in what we medical men call "healthily tired" after a hard day's work in my professional duties, and I was now sitting cozily by the blazing fire in my dining-room, with a glass of good claret on the little round table at my side.

My thoughts went wandering to and fro lazily, now resting upon some of the most interesting cases among my patients, now fluttering around a pretty picture of my only sister and her first baby, which her letter, received this morning from India, had called up; now straying into the stable to visit my bay horse—a new purchase, which I flattered myself did no small honor to my judgment in horse flesh. Gradually, however, all these subjects of pleasant reflection slipped into a mass, and got confusedly mixed together. I found myself gazing, without feeling the least surprised, at an odd vision, which showed me my sister mounted on my pet bay with the baby in her arms, who, instead of a baby's face, had the face of my neighbor and patient, old Mr. Spicer, the grocer, and soon after that I was sunk into a peaceful slumber, where no dream even came to disturb me.

How long I slept I do not exactly know, but I recollect I woke with a start, roused by the clock on the chimneypiece, which had a peculiarly ringing, clear sound, striking 8. I sat upright with a jerk and looked around with that vaguely uncomfortable feeling which often follows sudden waking. My glance happened to wander up to the mirror which was over the the chimneypiece. Why was it that, as I gazed at it, I uttered a low exclamation, and then shut my eyes, thinking that sleep must still be retaining its power over me, and that I must be dreaming a strange, fantastic dream.

But no, I certainly was not dreaming, for there it was just as it had been before. Fix my eyes as steadily as I might upon the mirror, with all my wakeful faculties concentrated upon it in eager earnestness, it was still there. I looked away, and fastened my look, for a minute or more, upon my mother's picture, which hung over the sideboard. Then my eyes were allowed to return to the glass; but this maneuver was useless also—it would not go, do what I would.

What I saw was certainly no alarming vision, though its appearance, there in the mirror, over my dining room chimneypiece, was remarkable and startling enough, to say the least of it. In the middle of the glass, which, in its other parts, reflected simply and naturally the commonplace objects in the room, chairs and tables and window curtains, there appeared a small but vividly distinct picture of a house and garden. It was a very pretty house, its front covered on one side with a green creeper, which was spangled with starry white blossoms, and on the other with a fresco such as I had heard described as existing on the walls of houses in Italy, where I had never been—a fresco representing an old woman sitting with a basket of oranges at her feet. There were four windows, two upstairs, two down, exactly over each other; they were all half shaded with green blinds, and I could see that the top one, on the right hand-side, was slightly open. Up the garden there ran a broad gravel walk, with soft fresh turf, gemmed with flower-beds on either side of it. The inclosure was fenced round with a rather high wooden paling, and in one corner of it there stood a summer house, with a quaintly-shaped roof, that had something of a pagoda about it. Over the whole there was spread a soft, silvery light, as though a bright, full moon was shining down upon it. A yellow gleam stole through the open window, and mingled with the white rays without.

I laid my finger on my pulse. Was I going fast into a raging fever. My pulses were as steady as they were when I rose that morning after a night's sound sleep. I tested my brain by going through, in my mind, all the symptoms and features in a difficult and perplexing case which had been lately under my care; my mind acted as coolly and calmly and regularly as it had ever done. I repeated to myself several passages of poetry from different authors in different languages; they came as quickly and easily to my tongue as if I had been reading them from a printed book. I gazed around, and fixed my eyes on various objects in the room to see whether I should be subjected to other optical illusions; but in all other points my eyes were as reasonable as they usually were: they showed me nothing but the familiar chairs and table, and the well-known pattern of the paper on the wall. Then I looked back at the mirror. The house was still there.

Had I been reading lately a description of such a house, or had I lately seen anywhere a picture like it? Either of these things might possibly have left a vivid impression on my mind, which might have accounted for the strange delusion. I was not, however, able to recollect, search my memory as I would, that a book or a painting had brought such a house and garden before my thoughts. I was naturally neither excitable nor imaginative; indeed, I was generally regarded by every one who knew me, and by myself into the bargain, as one of the most prosaic, rational beings in the world. My fancy had never before played me the smallest trick, even as I rode home, worn out with watching by a sick-bed, on the darkest night; even in the many painful scenes full of death and gloom through which my professional life had led me. In the dissecting room, in the severest operation, my hand had always been as steady as if I were peeling an orange. All this made the present incomprehensible vision yet more utterly inexplicable. Besides, even while I gazed at it, I knew that I had never felt more calm and collected and more in an ordinary condition of body and mind throughout my very commonplace, very busy history.

Would another pair of eyes see the house in the mirror? I wondered. With a hurried hand I rang the bell to test this point, and summoned my housekeeper, who generally herself waited on me. This good lady's name was Mrs. Trickey. It is a common Devonshire name, let it be at once understood by those who are not aware of the fact, and is in no way meant to hint at any unpleasant proclivities or unwarrantable whims on the worthy dame's part; she was as honest and simple-minded a woman as ever handled a bunch of keys.

"Mrs. Trickey, I have rung for you to ask you to do a very simple thing," I said hesitatingly, now that she was present, scarcely knowing how to begin; for I felt, if I spoke out plainly, my housekeeper must infallibly think that I had suddenly taken leave of my senses.

"What will 'ee please have, sir?" replied Mrs. Trickey, in true Devonshire fashion.

"Mrs. Trickey, will you please look in the glass over the chimney-piece?" I blurted out rather abruptly, not knowing how else to find out what I wanted to discover.

"Get along with your nonsense, Master Fred," cried Mrs. Trickey, with a toss of her head, which was so energetic it almost discomposed the stiff frills of her cap.

It must be mentioned here that Mrs. Trickey had lived with my mother when I was a boy, and that, with her, I still continued Master Fred, though all the world besides knew me as Frederick Heathcote, Esq., surgeon.

"I can assure you, Mrs. Trickey, I meant no insult, nor even a joke," I replied humbly. "I fancied something was wrong in the reflection of the glass; perhaps Susan has not dusted it as she should. Will you please look into it with your experienced eyes, Mrs. Trickey?"

I had some hopes that this last implied compliment would have propitiated the housekeeper; but apparently it had no such effect, for after a short inspection of the mirror she said tartly:

"The glass be right enough so far as I do see; this be just one of your items, Master Fred."

"But, Mrs. Trickey, do please tell me what you see when you look into it?" I exclaimed, seeing that I must be more explicit if I wanted to gain full certainty on the matter.

"Why, what should I see but my own face, Master Fred?" she retorted snappishly; "and it be as good looking a face as the faces of many women who be ten years younger than I be, and I can tell 'ee that it have been thought a good-looking face by scores of men in its time."

And herewith she bridled considerably, and drew herself up.

"And do you see nothing there besides your face, then, Mrs. Trickey?"

"Bless and save us, Master Fred, you must be turning mazed, I think, or else it be that you be making a regular fool of me. I don't see why you should make up such gammots about my face, when you've aknowed it these last twenty years. I calls it very disrespectful, that I do."

And with a flounce and a bounce, Mrs. Trickey turned and disappeared from the room, leaving me alone with the house in the mirror, which most certainly she had not seen.

I was musing uncomfortably on this fact, with my eyes fixed on the vision, which to me was as distinct as ever, when the clock on the chimney-piece struck 8:45. Then suddenly, as if wiped out by a spirit's wing, just when the little silver chime of the clock was ringing, house, garden, summer-house, moonlight, yellow gleam, vanished from the mirror, and I saw nothing there save the reflection of the familiar room.

It was certainly a more wonderful phenomenon than any which my medical books and medical knowledge had taught me, and I sat up late that night thinking it over and trying vainly to account for it. As, however, I could not gain the slightest light on the subject, turn the matter up and down as I might in my brain, I came to a resolution on two points, and then went to bed. One of these resolves was, that I would not reveal the strange circumstance to any one, because I had always a most hearty dislike of gossip and ridicule at my expense, and the other was that I would not allow the inexplicable vision to trouble my mind, so as to make me incapable of the daily work and duty of life. My natural calmness of temperament and my active, busy course of existence made me more able to make these determinations with some chance of keeping to them than most people in my place.

I slept well that night, and did not see the house in the mirror once in my dreams. Next day I was sent for in haste to attend a dangerous, difficult case, which required all my skill and energy. By the time the evening was again come, the impression made by the strange circumstance of last night had in a great measure faded out of my mind.

It so happened that I was engaged to spend that evening with my friends Mr. and Mrs. Woodland. Mr. Woodland was a banker, and his wife was a pretty, sparkling woman—the queen of society in our town. She and I were always close allies; she would chatter to me of all her family affairs, and in a certain way made me her confidant. On the occasion in question I was Mr. and Mrs. Woodland's only guest. The banker slumbered in his arm-chair, the lady had two or three bits of gossip to tell about the neighborhood, and two or three books to discuss with me, and a deal to say besides about the first appearance of a tooth in Miss Baby's little rosy mouth. That young heroine was brought down in state in her nightdress, and I had to examine the prodigy with much circumstance and solemnity.

Baby had retired again to the nursery, and had ceased her somewhat loud remonstrances with regard to the inconvenience of being brought down stairs to appear in the drawing room in such a costume and at such an hour. Mrs. Woodland was standing on the hearth rug looking in the mirror when the town clock in the market place hard by struck 8. I was looking at the reflection of my hostess' face in the mirror, and thinking that it was certainly a very pretty one, when suddenly at the side of the lively brown eyes appeared precisely the same house, line for line, which I had seen in my dining-room mirror yesterday at this same hour: garden, pagoda-like summer house, silvery moonlight, yellow lamplight gleam—all were there.

I could not help a start and a murmured expression of wonder. Mrs. Woodland turned round quickly at the sound.

"What is the matter?" she asked in surprise.

"Oh, just a twinge of rheumatism in my shoulder," I answered carelessly. "I caught it riding home through the storm yesterday."

"Mr. Heathcote, what do you see so wonderful in the looking-glass to-night?" she asked a few minutes after, noticing with feminine quickness the direction in which my eyes, in spite of myself, were so frequently turned.

"I was thinking that if I was a little handsomer man than I am, I should try to get a wife made exactly on your pattern," I replied lightly.

With these and a few more jesting words I contrived to put Mrs. Woodland's curiosity to sleep again, while, from time to time, I watched the visionary house. It was just as I had expected; when the town clock chimed a quarter to 9, it vanished exactly as it had done on the previous night.

From that time forward, wherever I might be, if I was in the room with a looking glass, I saw every evening, from 8 to 8:45, for the next month to come, the house in the mirror. Sometimes it met my view in the tiny looking glass on a cottage wall, where I was tending a poor patient, sometimes in the pier glass of a sick fine lady's apartment, sometimes in the mirror of a friend's dining room as I sat at dinner. There was never the faintest change in the vision: it was always marked by exactly the same features. I cannot say but that this perpetual haunting of my life by so mysterious an apparation did make a vaguely uncomfortable and painful impression on my mind. But by strength of will, and by clinging resolutely and ceaselessly to all my active daily duties, I prevented its having a morbid, unhealthy effect upon me. I revealed the circumstance to no one, but appeared to the outer world as if there was no strange page in my commonplace story.

When, however, a month or so had passed by, there came a great, sudden, real sorrow, which most effectually thrust aside all inclination to brood over gloomy, shadowy, fanciful troubles. One morning there arrived a telegram from Lecco, on the Lago Como in North Italy, saying that my sister, on her way home from India, had fallen dangerously ill there, and calling me at once to her side. I knew that Lottie's health had been delicate ever since her baby was born, and that she was about to return to England for the sake of a cooler climate and the best medical advice. I knew, too, that she meant to return through Italy, but I was hardly aware that she had, as yet, started from Bombay, and I had not the faintest notion that her disease might possibly take such a dangerous turn. No wonder, then, that the tidings were a severe blow.

Lottie was far more to me than sisters generally are to their brothers. She was several years younger than I was, and she had been first my plaything, then my pupil; and I had experienced a pang of real jealousy on that day when, sitting on a stool at my feet, with her sweet face hidden on my knees, she confessed to me that there was one who was more to her than I was, one who was more to her than all the world beside. This foolish feeling, of course, quickly passed away, and I rejoiced to see her a happy bride; yet Lottie was still my pet, my pride and my darling.

I will not dwell upon the hurried journey, with Fear sitting at my side, nor the long nights and days of dreary, anxious watching. It suffices to say here that my sweet girl was, at length, given back to my arms, after, through long weeks, my medical care and skill had battled with death for her. During the whole of this period the house in the mirror never again appeared to me, and indeed, in my absorbing anxiety and trouble, the remembrance of it even hardly entered my mind.

One lovely evening in early spring, when Lottie was much better, but not strong enough yet to be moved, I had been taking a long ramble into the lovely country which surrounds Lake Como, and on my return had lost my way. The sun had set, the moon had risen, and was bathing the world in a silver sea. I had reached a path by the lake, and was pausing to consider in which direction Lecco lay. The scene around was all one glory of stillness and of brightness. A breeze just stirred the waters softly with a kiss, the outlines of the distant hills were soft and tender, as if drawn by an artist-angel's pencil; here and there among them there was a white glimmer which told of a hamlet or a homestead; hard by a nightingale just struck a single golden note, and then was silent again, as if he feared to break the calm spell of the moon.

All at once I started, and a low exclamation burst from my lips. My eyes were resting on the surface of the lake, and there, mirrored on its clear waters, I beheld exactly the same house and garden which had so often, before I left England, met my view in such a strange, mysterious way. Disturbed, astonished, unable to believe my own senses, I glanced around behind me, and there, on a little rising ground above the lake, I saw a house which corresponded to the reflection below, and which was, in every respect, the realization of my vision. Just then the clock of some distant church up among the hills struck 8.

The whole circumstance and coincidence was so singular that I could not help being impressed and startled by it. Antagonistic though my whole energetic nature was to all imaginary fears and beliefs, I approached the gate of the garden, and noted how, in every smallest particular, even to the star-like flowers of the creeper on the wall, even to the fresco of the old woman with the basket of oranges at her feet, even to the slightly opened window with the ray of light gliding through it, it was the complete likeness of the house which had so often met my view in the mirror. The very name of the villa written over the gate filled me with a strange, eerie feeling; it was "La Casa dello Specchio." It had evidently been so named from the peculiarly clear and beautiful reflection which it had produced in the waters of the lake.

The complex thoughts and feelings which the sight of the villa and its name called up caused me to linger near it for some little time, until I began to fear that my mind was going to take a morbid, sickly turn, and I resolved to leave the spot at once. Just as I had turned to go, however, a gold seal, which had belonged to my father, and which, therefore, was much valued by me, happened to fall from my watch-chain, and I spent some time in looking for it; for it had rolled down the hill into the grass.

I had at length found the seal, and was moving away, when the same distinct church clock struck 8:45. Scarcely had the sound died on the breeze, when a long, shrill cry came ringing out of the house into the night, apparently through the partially open window. After that, I cannot describe the motives which impelled me; I only know that, led by what was more like instinct than anything else, I rushed across the garden and entered the door of the lonely house.

There, the first thing I beheld in the little entrance-hall, was a girl, with a fair English face, in a state of evident great terror and agitation.

"What is the matter?" I asked. "I heard your cry. I am an Englishman, and I am here to give you any help and service I can."

"My father, who is lying ill, has just swallowed poison by mistake," she answered at once, for great grief is never surprised. "I could not help crying out when I discovered it. All our servants happen to be out, and I have no one to send to Como for a doctor."

"I am one," I said, "and, with God's help, I will save your father."

It so happened that that day I had been moving Lottie into more airy lodgings, and had put my little traveling case of medicines and instruments, for better security, into the pocket of my great coat, which hung on my arm.

The rest is quickly told. I saved, by the prompt measures I took, the poisoned man's life, and that fair girl has become my home queen. The villa is her father's property, and our brightest holidays are spent in "La Casa dello Specchio"—"The house of the mirror."

MY SWEETHEAT'S GOWN.

My love, she wears a ruddy dress
In bright and chilling weather,
White furs that, envious pale confess
They deck a statelier loveliness,
Or purple-plaided mantel—yes,
And costly hood, together.

Ah! love, my love.
Wear what you will,
And dazzle Nature yet,
You speak—you move—
And men forget—
They see you only, still!

My love may wear an ashen gown
Herself hath stitched together—
A frock to mask her fair renown—
A clinging cloak of oaken brown
And pieced with patches up and down
Against the wintry weather.

Yet love, my love,
Wear what you will—
(Would Fortune prove us so!)
Look—listen—move—
'Tis all we know—
You, only, hold us still!

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW

Sweets to the Sweet.

Jennie June: Candy, in this country, hath all seasons for its own; but perhaps the holiday month (December) is that one in which the thoughts of the young most frequently turn towards what somebody calls "lollipop sweetness." The instinct is as true and sure as that of birds in the spring-time, and made a gay young city belle give up, the other day, a "lunch," a matinee, a "German," and the prospect of a favorite escort to go into the country at the bidding of an old friend, to wear a "big" apron and take part in a "candy pull." There is a great deal more naturalness and love of simple, honest pleasure in people than we give them credit for. We hear about French glaces and bonbons, and when a young man sends a pretty girl a box of sweetmeats, they are the finest "imported," with gilt tongs to keep them from soiling her white fingers, but the kind of candy of which the most are sold at Huyler's are "plain taffy," "butter-scotch," and old fashioned molasses candy. Boston "chips" and Philadelphia "caramels" are all very well for a little caprice, but the demand for "taffy" is steady, and so universal that it has become the synonym of a temper sweetener. Twenty-five hundred pounds of candy for every day in the year, that is Huyler's average, and out of this probably 1,000 pounds are made up of the three simple kinds first mentioned. Candy is not so bad, when it is good, and Mr. Huyler, who began years ago by making a pure molasses candy and distributing samples of it free to all who would take it and try it, has made his name and fortune by sticking to first principles and maintaining an absolute standard for his sticky commodity; that is the reason why mothers are not afraid of it, and why it is sent into the interior as far as the Rocky mountains and even to Paris. It is curious, but in the French capital no such joy for the little ones as old-fashioned molasses candy is to be found. The bonbons are very fancifully dressed in all sorts of colors, and put up in the most exquisite boxes, but they are very dear, and seem only made for gifts, and not to take home, as we take home our "pulled" candy for the children to eat and enjoy. Candy pulls were great fun in the old days, and many a life-long acquaintance has begun by putting a girl at one end of a molasses bar and a young man at the other, and perhaps there is not a much better test of how a man will stand a "long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together," than the way he works at a candy pull.

SHAM FLOWERS.

French milliners find it difficult to understand the genius of American women. They are born with a deep-rooted conviction that Americans, including the women, are more or less savages; that the whoop of the aboriginal is still heard in the parlors of the Western continent; that they like high colors and flash styles, and that a thing is sure to "take" if there is enough trimming and furbelows put upon it. That artificial flowers have been condemned by all the canons of good taste on these shores they cannot believe; driven from the ball dresses and the bonnets, they have cunningly massed them upon the lingerie-covered fichus and fringed collarettes with them, and will be disgusted to find them still neglected, still unsought, and doomed to waste their imitated charms upon unappreciative air. It would be too much to suppose that the present condemnation of artificial flowers was an indication of permanent reaction against unnatural ornamentation or decorative shams—the wheel of fashion is more inflexible than the wheel of fortune—and must go its rounds, and at regular intervals come back to the same place. But it is at the same time true that a strain of practical sense and innate fineness in American women has always prevented them from adopting as articles de luxe the sham jewels and parures which make up so large a part of a French woman's decorative outfit. American men are willing to invest in diamonds because they consider them as good as money for all practical purposes and in any possible crisis of emergency, but they care little for the workmanship expended upon an inferior base, because this counts for nothing in the market, and is only valuable if it is unique. American women, therefore, wear diamonds upon all occasions, and upon extraordinary occasions all their diamonds, but they do not take kindly to mock jewelry, and could never be persuaded to wear enamelled gilt or false stones, unless it were to produce the proper "tone," and harmonize a general effect of color.

Patti's Finery.

New York Letter: Patti displays marvellous finery in each new opera in which she appears. As Lucia, the other night, the bridal dress was an elegant white satin, embossed with silver flowers. It is made with paniers, trimmed with silver fringe, draped over a front of the brocade, and a long train that falls in graceful folds. The sleeves are puffed, and the front of the open corsage is studded with diamonds of great beauty. With superb jewels in her ears, a crescent ornament adorning the head, and a string of the same precious stones encircling each wrist, she is dazzling to behold. Her acting in this important scene is handicapped by her gorgeous attire. She removes the wreath of orange blossoms from the head rather gently, for fear of tearing the point lace veil, prostrates herself on her knee very carefully before Edgardo, and, after the feigned struggling to prevent his leaving, finally comes to the center of the stage, and sinks gracefully to the floor; whereas Gerster, playing this scene, entered into it with such spirit, and such an utter disregard for her finery, that it brought down the house. She fairly tore the wreath from her head, crept on her knees before Edgardo, regardless of the rich satin dress, from which a shower of beads fell over the floor, and threw herself upon the slope at the back of the stage when Edgardo frees himself from her. But, of course, the great diva is privileged to follow her own sweet will. She wore in the first act a charming costume of robins' egg blue in some soft, clinging material. It was profusely trimmed with ribbon velvet of a darker shade. In the mad scene her costume is a white robe de chambre of lace, made with angel sleeves, fulled on the shoulder and reaching only to the elbow. Her heavy raven hair falls over her shoulders, she presents a very pretty picture in her charming simplicity, as she trips out repeatedly to acknowledge the calls of the enthusiastic audience and receive the corsage bouquets thrown by ladies from the boxes.

Kid Bonnets and Others.

Kid bonnets are imported, the edges of which are decorated with fine hand-painted wreaths of delicate flowers and vines. Some are also garnished with a flat embroidery of pearl or crystal bead work. They are extremely elegant and tasteful, and can be made at home at little expense. Time and taste are worth more than money, you see. A very large proportion of the imported opera bonnets are white. One of the Marie Antoinette shape, and exceedingly handsome, was shown lately by a New York importer, and was made entirely of large white pearl beads, strung on golden wire. Inside the brim was a ruching of fine gold lace, and the only trimming an extremely delicate, filmy lace scarf, passed partially over the bead-made crown, and caught at the sides by small filagree gold pins. Another pattern shown was of the London gipsy shape, composed of delicate dove-colored velvet. The inside of the brim is faced with violet satin, and close round the brim a narrow puffing of violet velvet covered with gold lace. A wreath of purple velvet heartsease passed round the crown, and just behind the left ear, on the outside of the brim, a cluster of Marie Kappenheim roses. Perhaps one of the handsomest and most elegant bonnets yet on record for this season is of white ottoman silk, the inside brim being faced with pale mauve satin. The silk is shirred over the frame, and trimmed with a cluster of snow white ostrich tips held in place at the side by a large buckle of Parisian diamonds. The tips are sprinkled with diamond dust, and perfumed with a faint odor of wood violets.

Decollete Mourning.

New York Letter: One of the ladies in a prominent box at the academy was a handsome widow, who created something of a sensation several years ago by marrying a rich old widower with one foot in the grave, and securing at his death a good share of his fortune, notwithstanding the opposition of his children. She has returned to New York society, but has not altogether discarded the emblems of woe; she appeared in a handsome black costume made with a decollete corsage, relieved by a garniture of white lace and diamond ornaments. She wore mauve ostrich tips in her hair. With her acknowledged charms, heightened by the sympathetic interest which is always felt for those attired in mourning garb, it would not be surprising to hear some day that this fair one had secured husband No. 3. It is very evident nowadays that mourning is adopted by too many people simply because it is considered the style or because it proves becoming, and not as an expression of sorrow. This is one reason why so many conscientious people object to wearing it, and, moreover, it is well known that the dyes used in crepe are very injurious to the health, which should do away, at least, with the veil being worn over the face. Fashionable mourning attire seems to admit of almost as many ornamental devices as any other. A devout worshiper, who was making her way to one of the fashionable churches on the avenue, the other Sunday, was got up in deep mourning that was quite as conspicuous as any colored raiment one could see worn in the street. The most striking feature of her attire was the coquettish arrangement of the veil; it was thrown back over the bonnet, brought around in front under the chin, and caught at either shoulder with ornamental fruits. The seal of fashion will doubtless soon render this affectation of display more acceptable than it seems now to unaccustomed tastes.

Walking Suits.

Visiting and walking suits are still made with round, short skirts, and trains are reserved for very ceremonious occasions. For example, an evening toilet of light pink crepe de chine has a slightly puffed round skirt, which falls over two pink satin plaitings. The polonaise may be of plain pink fabric or of cherry color and pink combined. The back forms the puffing, and, if necessary, the train. The polonaise may be replaced by a pointed waist of chestnut-brown brocaded satin, with flat paniers of the brown satin arranged over full paniers of pink satin, which fall below. This brown brocade is much combined with pink goods. Gray toilets retain favor. Some of these goods are in one shade of gray, the only contrast being in the combining of fabrics, with and without gloss. Others are in light and dark grays, gray and brown, or gray and Pompadour goods. Pretty fancy suits are to be seen in the latter combinations. They have plaited skirts, with the plaits about one inch deep, alternating in gray "moire" and cherry and pink Pompadour on a gray ground. There is made for wear with this skirt a plain gray moire polonaise, which opens and turns back on either side to form two large Pompadour revers. The elbow sleeves have Pompadour trimmings. The gray "moire" plastron is worked with steel and ruby beads. The collar is embroidered to match. Around the polonaise is a trimming of gray lace worked with steel beads. This style of dress may also combine navy blue and Pompadour fabrics. The plaits on the skirt are disposed as described, while the upper part may consist of a tunic, with long, square panel ends of plain blue material. The drapery and basque are trimmed with points of blue goods. The "Fedora" trimming down the front of the waist forms a double puffing; one is blue, the other Pompadour.

Fur-Lined Wraps.

In this uncertain climate every women should have at least one fur-lined wrap. The haut ton in these is this season either the dolman or the long loose wrap, known to the French dealers as the douilette and, to Americans as the Japanese. Next come the various forms of the circular, the Russian and the Princess Louise, both of them slightly fitted to the figure, and with loose bag sleeves, the difference between the two being so slight that it is difficult for the uninitiated to distinguish one from the other. The Princess Louise has, however, two seams in the back, making the garment a little like a redingote from a rear view, while the Russian is more like a straight sacque, with short bag sleeves. Another modification of the same garment is the Eureka, a sort of Russian circular, with short, square sleeves, with long, narrow, pointed flaps extending low on the sides of the garment, like those seen in pictures of the Middle Ages. A very handsome model is of natural seal, golden brown, closely curled, resembling Persian lamb. This is trimmed with dark brown beaver bands, the long lapels to the sleeves being of the same fur, a mere continuation of the wide border on the sleeve. Despite the cry that circulars are no longer fashionable, the demand for them is steady, and they remain the popular medium-priced garment, the ease with which they may be thrown off and on making them the most convenient wrap possible for wear to church or theater or any other place where it is desirous to remove the outer garment while sitting in a heated room and to resume it on again going into the cold air.

Fruits of Female Folly.

The folly of bleaching, or dyeing, the hair is being fully illustrated by a fair damsel of Gotham. A few months, possibly a few years ago, she became convinced that light hair would be more becoming to her style of beauty than the dark brown locks with which nature had dressed her head. So she secretly hied herself away to a hair dresser who advertised to turn hair of any color to a beautiful blonde. She came out of that shop a metamorphosed young woman. She went in a demure, brown-haired lassie and came out a golden blonde with that wild, half-startled expression which all people wear who go about with the consciousness of trying to deceive people about the color of their hair. Time passed on and this young woman became engaged to a gentleman, who very much admired her beautiful hair. Her envious friends told him it was the result of golden fluid; but she denied it most strenuously, and like many another man in love he believed her. Now she is seeing the folly of her deception. The bridegroom-elect wishes to go on a long journey as soon as the marriage is celebrated; the bride doesn't. Why? She can't take her hair dresser with her and she can't dye her hair herself, and if it is let alone for several weeks it will be all brown about the roots, and the husband will surely discover the fraud, and she doesn't know what to do. She would tell him now if she dared, but he said he would never marry a woman who dyed or bleached her hair, and so her courage fails and she is dying a thousand deaths because she dyed once.

They Dot It on the Wrong Foot.

A little Norwalk, Conn., boy got a sliver in his foot, and a motion to poultice the wound, made by his mother and seconded by his grandmother, was carried in spite of his objections. He kicked and screamed and protested that he would not submit to any such indignity, but the majority against him was two to one, and the poultice was made ready. It was arranged that the grandmother should apply the poultice while the patient's mother stood over him with a stick, with authority and instructions to apply that also if he made the least show of resistance. When all was ready the youngster was placed on the bed and operations began. As the hot poultice touched the boy's foot he opened his mouth to say something, but his mother, with the stick, awed him into silence. Again the boy strove to make himself heard, and again the upraised stick warned him to keep quiet. In a short minute the poultice was firmly in place, and the boy was tucked up in bed, there to remain until the medicine had done its work. As the urchin's tormentors moved away, a shrill, small voice came from under the bed clothes: "You've dot it on the wrong foot!"

A Pretty Figure.

Jennie June: The prettiest figure which has been seen on the stage for many a day is Effie Ellsler in her Quaker dress in Storm-Beaten at the Union Square theater. "If ever I marry," said a young man, with the natural obtuseness of men, to a pretty girl in frizzes and a stunning hat, as they were leaving the theater at the close of the play on the first night, "it will be a girl who wears a Quaker dress. That girl was just too sweet for anything." "Do you think so?" said blue eyes, wishing her frizzes and her hat at the bottom of the sea. "Didn't you?" continued the serene and unconscious personage she addressed. "Oh, of course, she looked pretty, but I thought her dress was rather stiff." And then she went with him and had some ice cream, the most stupid thing she could have eaten, and then went home and cried herself to sleep.

Children's Bonnets.

Bonnets for children are of all sorts—polo caps, round hats as large as a small cart-wheel, granny bonnets, beef-eaters, Tam O'Shanters, Derbys, sugar scoops, jockeys—literally, every shape is worn. Polo caps to match newmarkets and ulsters are very stylish for the streets. More dressy occasions call for wide-brimmed hats trimmed with long plumes, etc. Fur beaver hats muster in full force as the cold weather approaches, and are prettily trimmed with silken pompons or long plumes. Turkish fezzes are very popular, both for small boys and girls, and many pretty little turbans and bonnets are made of velvet or plush to match suits. Large collars are universal, and the newest thing in these is of scrim, with raised flowers, in imitation of the Pompadour lace.

Wedding Concerts.

At a recent wedding, instead of having the conventional devices which so weary one by their sameness—if one can be wearied with flowers in any shape—the happy bride and groom stood, during the ceremony, under a huge floral wishbone. To carry out the pretty idea the groom gave the bridesmaids each a golden wishbone set with tiny diamonds. Another novel idea introduced at another wedding was a pair of floral gates, which were opened for the bridal procession by tiny little midgets in white, who looked as if they only needed wings to make them angels.

For the Teeth.

This way of making a plum pudding cannot be too highly recommended: If fresh plums are in season, use them; if not, take a quart can of plums; put them into a basin on the stove; when hot, sweeten them plenteously; soak several slices of bread in the juice, then line a pudding dish with the bread, and pour the plums in. Serve cold with cream.

The diamond slices with sauce, which are very nice as an entree or in the place of the pie, which is the ordinary finish for a plain dinner, are simply plain cakes baked in diamond-shaped tins, and sent to the table on fruit or very small pie plates, with sauce poured over the slices. They should be almost as thin when baked as a slice of bread.

Muffins without soda, if baked in a hot oven, will be light and excellent. Take one cupful of sweet milk, one cupful of flour, one egg well beaten, about a third of a teaspoonful of salt. Have your gem pans very hot, fill about half full and bake. These are nice with butter alone, or with maple sugar syrup added.

This is an excellent recipe for Graham gems, and differs from any before given. One cupful of Graham flour, one cupful of fine flour, two eggs, two cupfuls of sweet milk, one-fourth of a teaspoonful of salt. Have the gem pans hot, and the oven hot, and twenty minutes will be long enough to bake them.

Apple custard pie should be baked with an under crust only. The filling is delicious if made of one pint of sweet milk, one pint of smooth apple sauce, well sweetened, three eggs; flavor with lemon or with a little cinnamon. This will make two small sized pies or one very large one.

A nice dish for breakfast is made by cutting pork tenderloins in thin slices; stew them in water till they are nearly done; then put a little butter in a saucepan, and fry them till light brown; serve them on buttered toast, with mashed potatoes.

Lemon fritters are delicious. To one cupful of milk and one egg allow the juice and pulp of one lemon. These may be served with sauce; in that case, add the grated peel of half a lemon to flavor the sauce.

A fillet of veal stuffed with fine herbs makes an excellent foundation for a dinner, and if nicely browned and served hot, with brown gravy, it may well take the place of chicken or duck.

Oatmeal cookies combine many good qualities, and will be relished by children. Make them just like an ordinary sugar cooky, using two-thirds oatmeal and one-third wheat flour.

Plumage.

One of the costumes of Duserzeon, of fine gray cloth, has a polonaise front elaborately draped up in the back, this opens at the breast over a vest of folds of velvet of same shade, and passementeries of chenille; half open at the waist, the polonaise is caught together by a double clasp of oxidized silver; the chenille ornaments are continued on the front of the skirt, the rows widening as they descend to the narrow pleating at the bottom.

Blue cloth costumes are plainly made, but gayly ornamented by rows innumerable of Veronese-red braid. The jockey basque opens over a puffed Moliere chemisette of red velvet, but fastened down the center with red silk buttons. The tunic is short in front, with still shorter Watteau folds behind. New combinations for similar dresses are brick-red with moss-green, slate-gray and poppy colors, tobacco-brown and electric-blue.

A tea gown forms as important a part of a bridal trousseau as morning wrappers formerly did. For blondes they are made with a long overdress of pale blue sicilienne and a short skirt covered with Venetian embroidery. For brunettes they are of vieux rouge surah, trimmed with a blouse vest and creamy lace in the Fedora fashions of Sarah Bernhardt's play.

Rich brocades, with patterns of many-tinted flowers in wreaths and sprays that copy nature literally in size and color, are on grounds of colored satin. Birds and butterflies, shrimps and many less agreeable objects, as well as many fruit designs, are employed for such rich materials as embossed velvets and elegant brocaded satins.

The pelisse is still the most generally accepted form for long cloaks. It is, however, slightly changed this season by being loose in front, but tight-fitting at the back, with ample fullness to allow room for the dress skirt beneath. Figured cloths, with Egyptian and Indian designs, are used in odd colors of blue and brown, with shaded plush or silk linings.

A tea gown of radiant blue plush is daintily trimmed down the front with antique lace in cascades over pleatings of blue satin, which is also carried to the back.

Triangles formed of many rows of soutache braid are newer than wheels of braid for ornamenting cloth dresses or cloaks.

Mousquetaire gloves are worn shorter than they were last season—that is, less wrinkled on the arm.

Forty small heads of the robin-redbreasts form the coronets of red velvet bonnets.

"FORTUNE MY FOE."

"Aim not too high, at things beyond thy reach,"
Nor give the rein to reckless thought or speech.
Is it not better all thy life to bide
Lord of thyself, than all the earth beside?

Thus, if high Fortune far from thee take wing,
Why shouldst thou envy counselor or king?
Purple or homespun—wherefore make ado
What coat may cover, if the heart be true?

Then, if at last thou gather wealth at will,
Thou most shall honor him who grants it still;
Since he who best doth poverty endure
Should prove, when rich, best brother to the poor.

WANTED AN INTERPRETER.

The Experiences of a Young American Who Ventured into the Interior Without Knowing the Language.

Life at the Native Hotel, Where the Stranger is Regarded as a Live Curiosity—A Japanese Fire.

NIKKO, Japan, Special Correspondence, Nov. 5.—If you never enjoyed the experience of being in a strange city in a strange land, where you could not say a single word to a person because you did not know the language, and where no one knew your language either, then you have not known what misery is. When I left the seaports and moved into the interior of Japan, I, of course, left English-speaking people behind me, since foreigners are not allowed to settle outside of the treaty limits. I did not care to go to the expense involved in carrying an interpreter for a two weeks' journey, and so went alone. I knew this was a rash step, but I did not then appreciate how rash. Leaving Yokohoma one noon I proceeded to Tokiyo, the capital of the empire, by railway. The distance, eighteen miles, is compassed in one hour's time. The railway, although built by the government so far as capital was concerned, was constructed by English skill, and cars, engines and all apparatus are essentially English in style. The road is a double-tracked, well-ballasted one, and pays the government well, it is said. Arrived in Tokiyo I proceeded to the cream-colored headquarters of Mr. Bingham, the American minister to Japan, where I made application for a pretty general passport.

Having secured my application, I proceeded by Jinrikisha to the Japanese offices. Here I was provided with a mysterious document, printed in Chinese characters, which, for all I knew, might have been a general order for my arrest and execution.

TOKIYO.

Riding through the streets of Tokiyo by jinrikisha is a bewildering and exciting experience. The city is popularly supposed to have had 7,000,000 inhabitants at one time—the largest population ever attained by any city in the world. To-day, by reason of war, fire, earthquakes and pestilence, it only contains about one-sixth as many inhabitants. There are acres and acres of burned ground in its limits. But it goes without saying that for crowds upon the streets the city more than equals the metropolis of most any other country. It is simply appalling to be bowled along in the midst of the throng of moving vehicles of every description. Whenever I take a ride my hair literally stands on end until I am safely returned to my headquarters; and yet, never but once was I the victim of a collision, and then I anticipated the event, and leaped into the front "parlor" of a Japanese house. Nothing could be more incongruous than the sight of modern street cars in the city of Tokiyo; yet they are to be seen on a large number of streets there. The cars have six wheels, but in other points are duplicates of those used in the United States. The Japanese driver has a fish horn, which he keeps blowing day and night, while on duty, as the streets are so narrow, and the paths taken so devious. There are both open and closed cars—all bearing Chinese letters on the outside.

When I reached the depot of the stage line my trouble fairly began. The interpreter was there, but he became the curse of my life—my evil angel, in fact. About the only thing he could say was "Give me money;" and he had that down to a fine point. I did everything I could think of to convey to these people the idea that I wished to go to Nippo. I exhausted the art of gesturing. Finally the ignoramus who was called an interpreter was seized with a bright idea. Motioning me to follow, he proceeded up the street half a mile or so, and I mechanically dogged his steps. Judge of my pleasurable surprise upon being led to Mr. Amerman, an eminent philologist in the Japanese language, who had sailed on the same steamer with me from America. He straightened out the tangles for me, and left me quite happy. For my ticket to Utsonomia, or Otsonomia, or Wutsunumia, or whatever it is, I gave the sum of 2 yen and 90 sen. I have a dim but terrible suspicion that I was cheated. I know that I ought to have been paid a princely sum myself for taking such a ride as that which followed. The ticket purchased, it was my next care to find lodgings for the night. For once the obnoxious interpreter proved himself useful by escorting me to a Japanese hotel near by. It was evidently a tony hotel—for native patrons—but I am not anxious to renew its acquaintance.

HOTEL LIFE.

Sitting down on the highly polished floor, with my feet still resting on the dirt court, always found in the front part of public and private houses alike, I removed my shoes, and wearily proceeded to negotiate by the gesticulatory process for accommodations. I had no idea before of the immensity of the task of communicating the simplest idea when the tongue is dumb. My tongue was absolutely dumb, for I did not know six words of the Japanese language. At length, by experimenting, I hit upon the sum of fifty sen, which extracted an eager affirmative nod from my native host, who was still rubbing the floor with his nose in token of abject hospitality. Then a "moosmie" (Japanese girl) led the way up a polished step-ladder into the second story. Like most upper rooms in Japanese tenements, it was dark, and enclosed on three sides simply by temporary screens plentifully supplied with paper windows about eight inches square that failed to communicate any light to the apartment. On one side was a chart covered with Chinese characters, which served to worry my curiosity during my whole stay. The customary tobacco bin and tea were promptly served. Then the landlord appeared, and after a long series of genuflections conveyed to my mind the idea that he wanted to inspect my passport. Ah, this was the modus operandi of registering at a Japanese hotel. He was absent a short time copying the document, and then returned it intact. Then another moosmie appeared with my supper, eggs, rice, tea and some unsavory-smelling soups, served on a pretty, lacquered tray. I had eaten heartily at the yadoya, and did not care for the things, but I could not for a time get the puzzled moosmie to understand why I declined them. Finally I made the simplest possible gesture to indicate an already distended stomach, and she metaphorically tumbled. Laughing immoderately, she descended to the room below and related the affair to all the other moosmies there, who in turn set up such a chorus of good-natured laughter as made my teeth chatter. If you long for notoriety, take passage for Japan and then patronize a native hotel. I was an object of the greatest interest to those in the house from the very first. Japanese etiquette is hardly identical with that of America, and these blooming moosmies could not satisfy their curiosity to see me. Time and again they drew aside the screens, courtesied with the usual remark "Ohaio," and then feasted their eyes upon my form. So popular did I become as a piece of hotel furniture, that a Japanese woman, who was making her toilet in the rear part of the establishment, came out upon the bridge connecting the front and the rear, and gazed and gazed, the while she effected a complete change of outfit. Across the hall was a bath-room of a rude, primitive character, which seemed to be liberally patronized, but which was unprovided with screens. My chamber did not contain a picture, mirror, or single article of furniture, until about 7 o'clock, when the andon was brought in. The andon is a Japanese institution, in the way of an illuminator. It consists of a wooden framework about eight inches square and three feet high, in the center of the paper top of which is a saucer of grease. A tiny wick leads up out of the oil, and this affords the national illumination. Coal oil lamps are being extensively introduced in the coast districts, and gas is found in most of the treaty ports. The Japanese always have an andon burning beside them all night.

TO THE INTERIOR.

At 6 o'clock the following morning we started. Imagine one of the most rickety omnibuses that ever held together, capable of seating six persons, and those seats all full, the entire conveyance being propelled by a pair of rusty-looking Japanese ponies. Well, it was as antiquated a looking carry-all as ever I saw; but we did just fly. I know how to pity poor Horace Greeley, in view of his memorable ride, for we averaged about ten miles an hour for the whole distance. At Utsonomia I put up for the night in a Japanese hotel of large pretensions, paying 70 sen for supper, lodging and breakfast. The first and last named of these articles I did not have much use for. My poor stomach was compelled to accept a liberal supply of rice, a few boiled but quite tasteless chesnuts, and some sour sweet potatoes.

The sanitary condition of the interior of Japan is something frightful. I have heard China cited as the most inferior nation in this respect, but I cannot see how any state of things can be less favorable than that which I have witnessed here in the land of the Rising Sun. The smells, the personal filth, the narrow streets in the crooked cities, the decaying animal and vegetable matter which is to be seen on every hand, combine to form an atmosphere that must invite pestilence. Were the government financially competent, I suppose this state of things would be remedied, for manifestly there is a progressive policy in the royal hall at Tokiyo. Foreigners are knocking for admission into the interior of this wonderful empire. Doubtless the immediate result of a concession on the part of the government would be more favorable to the foreigners than to the natives; but I could but think, as I rode along contemplating the sad squalor on every hand, that there would be an ultimate gain to these millions of Japanese cultivators were they made accessible, for purpose of trade, to the foreigners. They are numerically stronger than all other classes of people put together. Were the country developed by means of railroads, and were foreigners allowed to settle; and make a market for their produce, they would soon learn the benefit of payment in cash, instead of in kind. There is a feeling of political jealousy abroad in the country which prevents any such consummation. This feeling is natural and justifiable. Just as fast as the Japanese become competent to assume certain functions of government, it is best that they should do so. As soon as the pupil is sufficiently educated, he should dispense with the services of his teachers. Japan's foreign training-masters are being gradually superseded by educated natives, and though the transfer of authority may blockade the work temporarily, it represents real progress in the end. Many travelers leave Japan after only seeing the port cities, and they go away with glowing accounts of the country. Many penetrate into the interior, and are utterly disgusted. To pursue the former course is to talk of Japan without having seen it. Those who pursue the other course have an idea of the country, but fail, as I believe, to interpret what they see in the light of the country's past. Undoubtedly the great mass of the Japanese people are still plunged in ignorance, the devotees of superstition. But the waves of reform which have been started along the coast line will slowly advance, and spread over the whole island. The darkness of the picture which the interior presents only heightens the contrast, afforded by the study of the Europeanized treaty limits.

There is another reason why full authority is not delegated to foreigners to overrun the island. Many who have penetrated into the interior by means of passports, have abused this privilege sadly. This is the more to be lamented when it is remembered that the Japanese are inclined to err on the side of excessive hospitality. "Remove consular jurisdiction at the ports, and we will open up our empire," is the best promise which the mikado will make. We cannot deny the wisdom of such a defensive policy, but are unwilling to subscribe to the Code Napoleon, which is now the law of the land.

A FIRE.

At 3 o'clock in the morning during my stay at Utsonomia I was aroused from sleeping misery by the rattling of gongs and the hurry of feet along the street without. Drawing my nicely adjusted screens aside I peered outside and discovered the sky aflame with the terrible splendor of a Japanese conflagration. A fire in Japan means more than a fire in America, for the facilities for extinguishing it are very meager and primitive; and the proximity of the houses and the inflammable nature of the thatch of which they are composed aid in spreading the flames. My curiosity was ungovernable, and despite the seeming risk attending an experimental trip through the narrow streets of the city when the whole population is afloat, I started off in the direction of the fire. It was a rousing conflagration, and for a time threatened the obliteration of the whole city. Natives were hurrying hither and thither, each one armed with a Japanese paper lantern. After dark any Japanese city looks as if there was a celebration in progress on its streets, by reason of these lanterns, which are carried by everybody on foot, and by the moving or stationary vehicles, as well.

Now everything was excitement, and the jabboring of the natives was bewildering. There were comical policemen, some of them carrying swords at their sides. There were firemen with rude wooden buckets, pikes and cowl hoods over their heads. There were a number of almost useless hand engines with short tubes for throwing a puny stream of water. As I neared the scene of the disaster the natives were all busy removing their household goods, even for squares around. The equipage of a Japanese family is very limited, and I judged from the celerity with which the packing was done that each household was provided with large boxes for use in the oft-recurring emergencies that are the result of fires.

The different companies planted their respective banners upon the various roofs in the vicinity, so that they might not work at cross purposes. The principal efforts were to pull down the burning walls with long bamboo poles, and by the liberal use of water to render the adjoining tenements incombustible. There is seldom any space between houses in a Japanese city, so that the work was conducted with difficulty. At length the flames were under control, and only a block or so had been burned over—thanks to the prompt treatment of the evil.

Early in the morning I resumed the stage business, and arrived here at Nikko about 1 o'clock this afternoon. The roads were horrible, and we simply floundered in the mud most of the way. All this annoyance was compensated, however, by the magnificent and now famous avenue of cryptomerias, extending for fifty miles. These giant trees were planted, according to Japanese mythological lore, nearly 300 years ago, by some ancient worthy who did this work as a religious exercise, in lieu of making costly temple offerings. He ought to be alive to-day to witness the outcome of his pious deed, and enjoy the blessings which posterity would lavish upon him. I understand there is nothing that approaches it elsewhere in the world. Nothing could surpass it. Imagine an almost continuous double row of these beautiful trees, planted three or four feet apart, fifty miles in length, and I should judge 300 feet in height. Surely, there was something sensible in this heathen's heathenism. [illegible]

Colors for Woolens.

The favored colors for woolen goods are elephant gray, giraffe color, different shades of strawberry, and "blue capote." These materials are covered with all kinds of fancy designs, generally arranged in large groups, placed very far apart. The designs are horseshoes, full moons and parts of moons, or bunches of flowers. Embroidered materials are combined with plain ones, matching them in color. It is well for a small or slight figure only to employ the fancy article for the skirt and trimming. Another convenient arrangement is to have macaroon-shaped designs of silk or woolen fine cord or braid. They are disposed like columns between the plaits of the skirt, and graduate from small to large. They are either sewed around the basque in close garlands or form columns up the back and front of the waist. Small capes continue to be much worn, and new shapes are constantly being brought out. One of these has the front and back reaching to the waist, and terminates in the shape of an ace of spades. On the shoulder is a small loose sleeve, which is only sewed on the upper part of the armpiece. This sleeve falls flat when the arm is not raised, as though it formed one piece with the cape, but with the slightest movement it becomes evident that the sleeve is loose from the top of the arm. One either side of this sleeve is a rich jet passementerie fastening. This cape may be of fancy velvet, plush or brocade. Plushes are now manufactured for skirts which are perfect imitation of sealskin and beaver.

ADVICE TO A LOVER.

I.

Strive not, vain lover, to be fine;
Thy silk's the silkworm's and not thine;
You lessen to a fly your mistress' thought,
You think it may be in a cobweb caught.
What though her thin, transparent lawn
Thy heart in a strong net hath drawn?
Not all the arms the god of fire e'er made
Can the soft bulwarks of naked love invade.

II.

Be truly fine, then; and yourself dress
To her fair soul's immaculate glass;
Then by reflection you may have the bliss
Perhaps to see what a true fineness is;
When all your gauderies will fit
Those only that are poor in wit:
She that a clinquant outside doth adore
Dotes on the gilded statue, and no more.

Vice President Oakes, who is now in Oregon reports as the result of most careful inspection, that the Northern Pacific is in first rate condition and fully equipped for doing fifty per cent. more than its present business, which is greatly in excess of previous estimates.

Though stocks of nearly all sorts are "in the slough of despond," the New York Herald says, that ordinary business this far in December is 10 per cent. greater than last year; that money is dirt cheap; that goods are moving freely and buyers are laying in large stocks. On the whole the prospect for a large and safe business in the spring, is highly encouraging notwithstanding the weeding out of weak and unsafe concerns.

The remarkable red sunsets and sunrisings that have caused so much wondering in America, were seen in England as early as the 9th or 10th of last month, and they were seen in San Francisco as early as the 20th. Ocean voyagers now arriving report the same unparalleled phenomena both at sunset and sunrise all the way over. Whatever the cause of the singular appearance it is evidently wide-spread. In the course of a discussion at the meeting of the American Astronomical society, Packer institute, Brooklyn, last Monday night, the idea was given out that the "green sun" reported from South America, a while ago, was due to the same cause, whatever that may be. And as to that, there was a theory that there might be a cloud of meteoric dust outside our atmosphere and through which we are passing. At all events, and whatever the cause, the sight is one of the most remarkable and finest ever afforded, and it is something to be long remembered.

Representative Washburn's bill to repeal the laws allowing pre-emption of the public lands and amending the homestead and timber culture laws, is in some respects similar, to the amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill by Mr. Washburn last session and adopted by the house, but stricken out in the senate under the rule. This amendment is so modified by Mr. Washburn's bill this session as to overcome an important objection heretofore urged against the repeal of the pre-emption laws. This objection is that the pre-emption laws enabled a person who has failed to prefect his title under the homestead laws to obtain a piece of land under the pre-emption laws. The bill allows a person to make a second homestead entry in lieu of the pre-emption prevailing repealed. Mr. Washburn's bill is important to would-be settlers, and will no doubt receive a great deal of attention in congress but there is some doubt of its passage on account of the pressure of influence that prevailed against the measure last year.

Gen. Howard is severely criticised for recommending that deserters from the army shall be punished by long solitary confinement and by having the letter "D" branded upon them. This punishment, in time of peace, savors of brutality. The proposition to brand deserters implies that there is something more ignominious in leaving the military service than in leaving any other calling, and there is not, nor does anybody but professional soldiers imagine that there is. A breach of the contract made by an enlistment is no more disgraceful than a breach of the contract made by an agreement to serve for a specified time in a mill, or a foundry or a printing office. It is in either case personally disgraceful to a man not to keep his contracts; but no one thinks that a breach in civil life deserved branding or any other ignominious punishment. In time of war, in presence of the enemy, severe measures to prevent desertion may be justifiable.

Carl Schurz has dissolved his connection with the New York Evening Post, "in consequence of serious differences of opinion between himself and associates concerning the treatment of important public questions in the editorial columns,"—those differences, as Mr. Schurz has said, "in the matter of the relations between corporations and their employes," which Mr. Schurz regards "as of constantly increasing importance." The above being somewhat blind to a majority of readers, Mr. Godkin, the present editor-in-chief of the Post explains in this way. Mr. Schurz sympathized with the striking telegraphers last summer and the other owners of the paper could not endorse the strike, and took opposite grounds. Mr. Schurz at once ceased editorial work, but retained his interest until now. Under Mr. Leggett, and his successor, William Cullen Bryant, the Post was a brave defender against oppression of every kind; now it bends to the big corporations and lets the people right themselves as they may, without its sympathy or support. Corporations and capital seem to be having their own way as never before Will it always be so? We shall see.

EPITOME OF THE NEWS.

Washington Gossip.

Gen. Brisbin of Fort Keogh is in Washington. He had a talk with Assistant Secretary Joselyn on the subject of exclusive privileges in the Yellowstone National Park. He was informed that there were no exclusive privileges, but that the secretary of the interior could grant privileges at his discretion. Gen. Brisbin has authority to put a steamboat on Yellowstone lake. This privilege will not be interfered with at present. The steamboat will not be placed on the lake until the number of tourists is large enough to justify it as a business enterprise. Gen. Brisbin says that the Yellowstone park will become a great national resort.

Senator Harrison of Indiana and his wife and daughter left Washington last week for Indianapolis. They will go to Omaha to be present at the wedding, on the 29th inst., of their son and ex-Senator Saunders' daughter. The defense admitted the charges, and asked the court to look into the matter in mitigation of the sentence. The sentence was withheld pending the result of a civil action brought by the Cronins against the priest.

Mrs. Judith Fitzpatrick, a widow aged seventy, living at Lecomptop, Kans., was murdered at her home the other night, and an attempt was made to burn the house, with the evident purpose of concealing the crime. Opening of the Cantilever Bridge.

LOCKPORT, N. Y., Special Telegram, Dec. 20.—At an early hour this morning special trains from New York and Chicago, bearing the officers and guests of the New York Central and Michigan Central railroad from Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse and other cities came rolling into the depot here, where they unloaded their throngs of passengers who came to witness the formal opening of the great cantilever bridge over the Niagara river. At 11 o'clock the bridge was tested by placing a number of Mogul engines, whose aggregate weight was 2,000 tons, upon the center of the bridge, and a large number of engineers, members of the American society, made a careful examination of every part of the structure. Every part was declared firm. The deflection was trifling and the bridge was pronounced a success. Following this test two trains of palace cars, in which were the 2,000 invited guests were run upon the bridge and there photographed. The first crossing of the bridge was made Dec. 6th last, when Division Superintendent Burrows, of the New York Central, accompanied by a number of civil engineers and experts, members of the press and one or two ladies crossed on his pony engine No. 513.

The bridge is located about 300 feet above the old railroad suspension bridge, spanning a chasm 870 feet wide between the bluffs and over 200 feet deep. As the foaming rapids at this point rendered it impossible to build piers in the river or erect temporary supports, it was necessary to design a structure which could be erected without such false work; to attain this end a bridge of the cantilever type was adopted which would be self-supporting during erection. The principle of the cantilever is that of a beam supported at or near its center, with arms extending both ways, one arm being held down by an anchorage or counterweight so that the load on the overhanging arm produces an uplifting force in the opposite end which is resisted by the counterweight. The structure consists of two immense steel towers, 132 feet 6½ inches high, resting on stone piers thirty-nine feet high. Each of these towers supports a cantilever 395 feet 2 5-16 inches long. One end of each tower rests upon an abutment at the edge of the bluff, while the other end extends out over the river. The shore ends of the cantilevers are anchored to the abutment masonry or anchorage piers, and both river arms are connected by an intermediate span of 120 feet, which is suspended from the extreme ends of the river arms. The total length of the bridge proper is 910 feet 4⅝ inches between the centers of the anchorage piers; the clear span between towers being 470 feet. The height from surface of water to base of rail is 239 feet. The towers are braced steel structures, containing four columns each, which are made up of plates and angles riveted together, braced with horizontal struts and tie rods. The batter of the columns at right angles to the center line of the bridge is 1 in 8, and parallel to the center line 1 in 24. The trusses are two in number, 28 feet apart between centers; the various members being connected with steel pins 7½ inches, 6¾ inches, and 5⅜ inches in diameter, turned accurately so as to fit the bored pin holes within 1-64 of an inch. The depth of the cantilever trusses over the towers is 56 feet, and at the shore ends 21 feet, and at the river ends 20 feet. The lower chords and centerposts are made of plates and angles riveted together and latticed, the intermediate posts being of 12 by 15-inch channels, latticed. The upper chords of the cantilevers are 8-inch bars, the shore arms having a compression member 18 inches deep composed of plates and angles packed between the chord bars. The shore ends of the cantilevers are attached to short links, oscillating on pins anchored to the abutment masonry, which serve as anchorages and also as rockers to allow for expansion and contraction of the shore arms produced by changes of temperature. Expansion joints are also provided for at the connection of the intermediate span with the river ends of the two cantilevers. The structure is proportioned to carry, in addition to its own weight, a freight train on each track at the same time, weighing one ton per lineal foot, with each train headed by two 70-ton consolidation engines, with a factor of safety of 5. The wind bracing has been proportioned for a pressure of 30 pounds per square foot, on a surface twice the area of one face of the truss, plus area of floor system, plus the area of side of train taken as 10 feet vertical height.

Health of American Hogs.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 19.—Mr. Curtis, member of the commission appointed by the president to investigate diseases among swine, has returned from the West, and submitted his report to Commissioner Loring. Mr. Curtis visited all the great packing houses of Chicago, and examined the condition of hogs on farms, and reports a great deal less disease among Western swine than reported. So far as feeding is concerned, he is satisfied that it is conducted in a manner conducive to the health of the animals, and declares there is absolutely no foundation for reports circulated, to the effect that hogs were fed on offal from slaughter houses and farms. Curtis expresses the opinion that two inspectors in each packing house would be sufficient to thoroughly inspect all pork for foreign or domestic markets. The report states that Western people were found extremely anxious for the adoption of an efficient system of inspection of pork, so that they as well as the foreign markets may be protected against trichinosis and similar diseases. Therefore, they are willing to co-operate heartily with every attempt made by the government to give American pork a good reputation, based upon thoroughly good quality. It is suggested by Commissioner Loring that Western hogs might be improved by the infusion of new blood of good quality, as close "in-and-in" breeding pursued by many, especially in the case of Poland-China hogs, tended to increase the production of fat and somewhat enervate the constitution of the animals. The full commission to investigate diseases of American swine will be called together at the department of agriculture in January next. Commissioner Loring has no doubt that they will be ready to report at that time.

A Bad Woman Entrapped.

At Leadville, Col., Mary Kofford called on Dr. Rose, a prominent dentist, and made the startling request that he furnish her with poison which could not be detected by an autopsy. She offered $300 compensation, reluctantly admitting that she wished to get rid of her husband, Hans Kofford, that her husband's brother of whom she was enamored, and herself might together enjoy the insurance of $5,500 which her husband carried. After making an appointment to meet both at his office the doctor arranged with the police and several interested insurance men to be present but concealed. At the interview the whole diabolical plan was made known. The couple was immediately arrested and jailed. The younger brother is sixty years of age and the woman thirty-five.

Losses on Villard Stocks.

A Wall street broker who said he spoke from personal experience, said the other day that the following amounts had been lost in Villard stocks during the last two months: D. O. Mills, $500,000; Drexel, Morgan & Co., between $500,000 and $600,000; Horace Porter, $400,000; C. E. Higginson & Co., $450,000; Winslow, Lanier & Co., between $300,000 and $400,000; ex President Billings, $500,000; Deckler, Howell & Co., $500,000; Samuel Bobcock, $300,000; Work, Strong & Co., $250,000. Against these figures are the amounts which accrue to the bears: Woershoffer & Co., $480,000; Henry Clews & Co., $900,000; Hamburger & Co., $500,000; William R. Travers, $500,000. There are other people, myself included, who took our little shares out for the Villard railroad. There are probably a hundred other people who have lost fortunes in Mr. Villard's stocks whose stories will never be heard.

The Observer's Cairo dispatch says the British government has explicitly informed Egypt that it will not attempt to reconquer the Soudan nor permit Egypt to make the attempt. England, however, is willing that any other power do so at Egypt's request, providing the khedive incurs no expense. England is willing to send a fleet to Alexandria and assist in the defense of strictly Egyptian territory, if the same is threatened by El Mahdi. Reuter's Cairo correspondent, however, denies that England is willing to dispatch a fleet to Alexandria, or permit another power to send an expedition to the Soudan.

The president sent a long list of nominations to the senate, mostly recess nomination—postmasters, United States marshals, United States attorneys, district judges, naval officers, etc. Confirmations: Lawrence Weldon, Illinois, judge of the court of claims; J. R. Tanner, Illinois, United States marshal, Southern district of Illinois; Nathaniel P. Banks, Massachusetts, United States marshall of Massachusetts; Alonzo Gesner, Oregon, Indian agent at the Warm Springs agency and Pawnee Otoe agency; Col. Samuel B. Holabird, quartermaster general; John S. Toker, Michigan, secretary of Montana; Robinson Locke, Ohio, United States consul at Newcastle.

The consideration of the report of the committee on rules was resumed.

HOUSE.—Not in session.

Wednesday, December 19.

SENATE.—Bills were introduced for a commission to investigate railway transportation, consolidating the bureau of military justice and the corps of judges advocate of the army. The new rules were considered, and the clause in the first limiting to three days the period for which the vice president may designate a senator to preside over the senate in his absence was rejected. Various other clauses and rules were voted upon, some being rejected and others adopted. The senate agreed to the house resolution for a holiday recess, after so amending it as to fix Jan. 7 as the date of reassembling.

Another long list of recess appointments went to the senate Dec. 19th inst., the majority of them postmasters. The following nominations were confirmed:

Walter Evans, commissioner of internal revenue; Albert W. Wyman, treasurer of the United States; Elward O. Graves, assistant treasurer of the United States; Richard Gibbs, New York, minister resident and consul general, Bolivia; Charles B. Frail, secretary of legation, Brazil; William T. Strong, secretary of legation, Vienna; Jacob F. Walther, collector of internal revenue, Nineteenth district of Pennsylvania; Mathew R. Barr, Erie, Pa., and Henry Ward, Leadville, Colo., Indian inspectors; Indian agents, Denny D. Waters, Connecticut, Colville agency, Wash.; James F. Gardner, Colorado, Ouray agency, Utah; Elisha W. Davis, Colorado, Uintah agency, Utah; Oliver Ward, Ohio, Neal Bay agency, Wash.; Benjamin W. Thompson, West Virginia, Sisseton agency, Dak.; Sanderson R. Martin, Pennsylvania, Shoshone agency, Wyo.

HOUSE.—After a long debate, in which Mr. Belford (Rep.) spoke in favor of Skinner (Dem.) whose election as representative from the first district of North Carolina was contested by Pool (Rep.), Skinner was given the seat and sworn in. A concurrent resolution providing for a recess from Monday, 24th inst. until Tuesday, January 3, was adopted. The committee, on rules reported a resolution for the creation of several new committees after an amendment for a committee on the alcoholic liquor traffic had been adopted, by 143 to 88. A resolution increasing the membership of twenty-three standing committees, from eleven to thirteen members each, was adopted. A resolution was reported from the committee on rivers and harbors. The senate amendment to the holiday recess resolution was concurred in.

Thursday, December 20.

SENATE.—Bills were introduced establishing a board of railroad commission and regulating inter-state commerce and authorizing distillation of fruit without federal taxation to the states. After a long debate, a resolution calling on the secretary of the interior for information concerning lands granted to railroads was adopted.

The consideration of the rules consumed the rest of the day, and after an executive session of half an hour the senate adjourned to Monday. During the executive sessions the senate confirmed a long list of appointments made since the adjournment of the last congress, nearly all of which have been announced.

HOUSE.—A discussion took place over a resolution, to grant a month's extra pay to discharged employes, which was finally referred to the committee on accounts. A resolution increasing the membership of several committees was adopted, as was a resolution for a committee on rivers and harbors.

A resolution for a woman suffrage committee was rejected—88 to 121. A joint resolution was adopted asking the president by proclamation to recommend the observance by the people of the 24th inst. the 100th anniversary of Washington's surrender of his commission.

Both houses adjourned till Monday.

Matches.

"That match you are lighting your cigar with is a very small thing, isn't it?" said a passenger who had shared my seat for a few miles. "A small thing, but you wouldn't believe that American people paid out $27,000,000 for matches last year, would you? It looks big, but it is a fact. Now take a pencil and figure it out. Fifty millions of people in this country; they use on an average five matches each per day; that is 250,000,000 matches daily, or 2,500,000 matches boxes of 100 matches in a box, every day. Last year these boxes retailed at an average of three cents each, making $75,000 a day for matches, or $27,375,000 a year. And then to think that three-fourths of all these matches were supplied by one company! If they didn't make $8,000 clear profit out of it they didn't make a cent."

The harvest day of the match monopoly is now at an end, as they no longer have a government revenue tax levied for their benefit. But they still control the trade, on account of their superior manufacturing facilities, large capital, etc. They own thousands of acres of timber land in Michigan, and their lumber is cut by their own men and shipped on their own boats. And then they have contracted for nearly all the world's supply of phosphorus years ahead, and the new manufacturers starting into business find themselves overmatched in many ways by the monopoly, which can still control the trade and make a fair profit on the investments. They control twenty-two factories, and one of them has a capacity of 72,000,000 of matches daily.—Chicago Herald.

Several days ago William H. Conkling came to Omaha from Minnesota and stopped at the Paxton hotel. He was a man of striking appearance and evident wealth, and said he would make that city his home, build a fine residence and bring his family there. He had been drinking heavily ever since he had been there, and died on the 21st. It is believed that his father lives at Sidney, Ohio.

Gen. Pope and staff lately transferred from Omaha to San Francisco were surprised to find their quarters covered with blooming roses, Geraniums etc., and the air as balmy as tropical zephyrs.

The Duke of Edinburgh, having apparently given up the idea of again going to sea, intends to farm on an extensive scale and to breed cattle.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

SCHOOL STATISTICS.

An Array of Figures Demonstrating Facts of Interest to the Educational World and the General Public.

By the official reports of the county superintendents, it is shown that the State of Minnesota now contains 4,575 school districts, of which 4,482 are common. The number of school houses and the valuation has been printed in a previous issue. The value of seats and desks is $147,975, and the value of school apparatus $77,591. The value of school libraries is $19,790, an increase of $10,000 over last year. Hennepin county has the largest sum invested in seats and desks, $20,600, and Kandiyohi in apparatus, $6,025. Polk has the most expensive school library, it being valued at $7,250. Ramsey follows at $1,745. The tables given below will show the number of school districts, value of seats and desks, apparatus and libraries in detail, by counties. They are copies of the official tables which will appear in the annual report of the superintendent of public instruction, now in course of preparation.

Minnesota Patrons of Husbandry.

The grange was called to order in secret session at Minneapolis on the 19th, by Col. Samuel D. Adams, master, and Prof. Porter of the State university delivered a brief address of welcome to the visitors. Among the state grange officers present, in addition to the worthy master, were the following:

Steward—N. Small.

Assistant Steward—N. H. Post.

Chaplain—James Sutterland.

Treasurer—Sarah G. Baird.

Secretary—Thomas Tunis Smith.

Gate-keeper—J. R. Hill.

Ceres—Agustua J. Adams.

Lady Assistant Steward—H. O. Stanchfield.

Executive Committee—W. S. Chowen and J. D. Scofield.

Col. Adams, worthy master of the grange, delivered his annual address, reviewing the work of the order during the year, and making suggestions calculated to increase its usefulness in the future. He touched upon the encroachments made by the corporations of the country upon the farming interests, the cultivation of amber cane, the advantages to be derived from the agricultural college, and the amendment to the constitution, etc. Mr. Whitney, of Iowa, also reviewed the transportation question at some length.

The committee on the good of the order submitted a report, in which the following suggestions were embodied:

A more thorough dissemination of grange literature is of vital importance to the order, and a lack of it accounts for the absence of great numerical strength in Minnesota. To stimulate growth in the granges it was recommended that purely agricultural publications be placed in every farm house and lecturers induced to visit neighborhoods until the objects of the order are clearly understood by every farmer. There should be more attention paid to the advertising meetings in daily papers and by posters, and to still further the cause we recommend that the executive committee publish a quarterly bulletin, which shall be a medium of communication between the officers of state grange and the subordinate grange, also between subordinate granges themselves. The necessity is apparent of urging this body to use every endeavor to place in the lecture field those whose whole soul is in the interests of the order. Our duty does not end here. Having secured lecturers, every effort should be used by each and all to secure a large audience that will carry home a new spirit—a greater zeal in this noble cause.

We would also recommend that the master and secretary of this grange ascertain if among the dormant granges there are any desirous of having their grange restored to activity, and if so, that this body assist all they can by sending missionaries into these fields.

The good of the order requires that every encouragement be given to the enlistment of the young into our fold, and that work be assigned them. We advise that a course of study be inaugurated in every sub-grange on scientific agriculture, and every measure be taken for the advancement of the young.

At the suggestion of Prof. Porter, Messrs. Scofield, Blaisdell, Adams, Smith, and Chowen were appointed as a standing committee on the Agricultural college, and the grange adjourned to meet at this institution on Dec. 9, 1884.

There were two failures reported on the 18th at Albert Lea, among the business men of that city. One was that of H. O. Hankness, dealer in agricultural implements. The liabilities are understood to be $7,000, while the assets are not known. Mr. Hankness has long been in business there, and his failure is greatly regretted by all. The other failure is that of O. G. Kleven, dealer in groceries and crockery, the amount of the liabilities being about $2,000, while the assets are said to be nearly equal. Mr. Kleven has been in business less than a year, but is well known in this part of the country, and it is hoped he will soon arrange things so as to resume business. Both failures were voluntary assignments, G. Gulbrandson being the assignee.

At a Presbyterian church fair in Red Wing one of the attractions was the appearance of the church choir, the male and female members of which blacked themselves in true minstrel style and sang minstrel songs. This part of the entertainment appears to have scandalized some of the good and solid brethren of the church, one of whom declared that it only needed the minister and the superintendent of the Sunday School for end men to make the thing complete.

Minnesota Stockgrower's Association.

An adjourned meeting of the Minnesota Stockgrowers' association was held at Minneapolis, for the purpose of perfecting the organization and disposing of other unfinished business. Permanent officers were elected as follows:

President—W. W. McNair of Minneapolis.

Vice president—C. A. D. Graff of St. Paul.

Second vice president—S. M. Emery, Lake City.

Secretary—A. G. Wilcox, of Minneapolis.

Treasurer—O. A. Pray of Minneapolis.

Mr. J. E. Stevens, Jr., from the committee on resolutions, submitted a preamble and resolutions, the latter being those adopted at a meeting of stockholders held in Chicago, and referring to the prevention of the importation of cattle and other stock suffering from infectious diseases—pleuro pneumonia among cattle especially. The preamble offered by Mr. Stevens concluded as follows:

Resolved, That we heartily endorse the foregoing resolutions, and that we ask the senators and representatives in Washington to use all honorable means, when the matter is brought up for consideration, to secure such legislation for the protection of our cattle and meat products as the secretary of the treasury and the national committee deem expedient.

Resolved, That the president and secretary of this association be instructed to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our senators and representatives in congress.

On motion of O. A. Pray the chair was authorized to appoint a committee of five to draft a constitution and by-laws of the Minnesota association, the committee being constituted as follows: Messrs. H. F. Brown, O. A. Pray, A. G. Wilcox, J. E. Stevens, Jr., and V. G. Hush.

On motion of Mr. Pray the next meeting will be held on the 1st day of February at 3 p. m., at Minneapolis.

How They Look Down There.

The Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Record photographs the Minnesota senators as they appear at the capitol: Samuel J. R. McMillan, of Minnesota, is a trim little Scotch Presbyterian, with short dark hair, short dark beard, and a round white spot on the back of his head. He wears black-rimmed eyeglasses. He is a good lawyer and a hard-working business man. He keeps the business of the commerce committee, of which he is chairman, well in hand, and he usually manages to make his point in the senate. He is a canny Scot, but he is not an eloquent nor an impressive man. He is an elder in Dr. Byron Sunderland's church, on Four-and-a-half street, and is a man of authority in the councils of the Presbyterian church. Personally he is modest and pleasant.

Dwight M. Sabin, senator from Minnesota, who was elected chairman of the Republican National committee the other night, is, like his predecessor, Marshall Jewell, a Connecticut man. Ten or twelve years ago he went from Connecticut to Minnesota a comparatively poor young man. His mother had a moderate living, but he had next to nothing. But he was bright, well educated and preserving. He was good manufacturing agricultural implements in a small way. He made some improvements in those he manufactured. He is now manufacturing them on a large scale, and at the same time is interested in other manufacturing establishments and in railways. He is only about forty, yet he is rich, and is to be richer. He has all the qualities of a successful politician. He has always been a power in Minnesota politics since his first year's residence there, when he was elected to the legislature. He was in the legislature from that time on until Windom found he could not secure a re-election. Then Sabin, who had peremptorily declined to serve two weeks before, came forward and accepted an election. For several years before that time he had controlled the legislature in so far as one man can control a body of that sort. Sabin is young and vigorous. He hopes for greater things.

Two years ago Ole Johnson mysteriously disappeared from Rendsville, Morrison county, and search failing to reveal his whereabouts, he was given up for dead. A letter has been received from him dated Winnipeg, asking his old friends for money enough to enable him to return to his home.

The question as to where the next encampment of the state militia is to be held will be decided at the annual State National guard convention in Mankato next month, Jan. 6. It is said the officers of the Manitoba railroad wish to secure its location at Lake Minnetonka, while the Winona board of trade has sent a committee to induce Gov. Hubbard to decide in favor of Winona.

A young clerk in a Duluth store was found robbing the cash drawer. He admitted taking $1,000 at various times, which he refunded, and was allowed to travel.

The new high school at Wadena will be dedicated Dec. 31. Assistant Superintendent of Public Instruction Pendergast will deliver the dedicatory address.

Ernest Mitchell, sixteen-year-old son of T. L. Mitchell of Worthington, was drowned recently by breaking through the ice on East Okoboja lake.

The state agent of the United States department of agriculture, has just received a package of postpaid envelopes and sacks which he is ordered to distribute among farmers of the several counties of Minnesota, with a request that the latter shall fill the sacks with corn and send them to the department for making analytical tests. It is regarded as unfortunate that these tests or analyses are to be made of this season's corn, and the weather was generally unpropitious throughout the state, and it is doubtful if the specimens sent will represent Minnesota's corn.

The news has been received in Faribault of the death of Rev. George L. Chase, warden of the Seabury Divinity school. He died the 18th.

Sheriff Marks of Mankato, took Jackson, alias Cummings, sentenced for burglary to one year's imprisonment, to Stillwater recently.

Charles Montseller's cap was blown off across the track at Fairmont recently. He started for it on a run, but striking the track, slipped and fell, when an extra coming from the East caught him, the engine cutting off a leg below the knee. He was taken to the hotel and the best possible care shown him.

Building improvements in Long Prairie the past season amounted to $57,835.

County Commissioner Lyman B. Jacobs, of Duluth, is dead.

Negroes Still Indignant Over an Old Robbery.

Washington Special: The colored national committee met recently and appointed delegates to the convention at Richmond, Va., July, 1884. Each congressional district is allowed two delegates. Fred Douglass, Register of the Treasury Bruce of the District of Columbia and Col. William Murrell of Maryland were elected members of the national committee. The committee on the Freedmen's bank made its final report, memorializing congress to reimburse the depositors, and denouncing the former act of congress creating a commission at $5,000 each to settle the affairs of the institution. In support of the adoption of the report, Murrell said the Freedmen's bank was the most disgraceful, sinful swindle that it ever stained earth or shocked heaven. The commission appointed at $5,000 per year each were like a hyena devouring a carcass, and then like a lion, smashing its bones and sucking the marrow therefrom; and, furthermore, a republican congress made this commission the pall bearers of the same carcass. The committee adjourned to meet in Chicago June 2 next.

Female Palmist Discourses on Her Trade That Smacks of the Mysterious.

Cleveland Herald.

Clairvoyants and fortune-tellers are usually untrustworthy persons, steeped in quackery and ready to take advantage of the superstitious side of human nature. A reporter met one of the class yesterday, and was astonished in the course of conversation, at the information the woman possessed on the subject of palmistry. Not in a mood to have his future life mapped out, the reporter talked to her solely in search of information. He got some very interesting matter for his pains. The woman was enthusiastic on the subject, and claimed to be infallible. She grew indignant when the reporter referred to palmistry as a pastime, and said: "No, sir! It is not a pastime, but a deep science, founded on principles created by Heaven. Show me a man or a woman's hand and face, and I will tell you his or her nature and qualities."

"Is it a difficult knowledge to master?"

"No; comparatively easy, though time and experience render the work of the palmist truer and more thorough."

"Are there fixed rules?"

"Yes, and they are not intricate ones. I don't know but I am divulging my trade secrets, but I have enough interest in palmistry to overturn your doubts. Hands are divided into three kinds—those with tapering fingers, blunt, square-tipped ones, and fingers that are spade-shaped, with cushions of flesh on each side of the nail. The taper-fingered hand is the highest and best type, and is possessed by poets, artists, persons of contemplative moods and with quick, sensitive minds that turn to the ideal rather than the real. The blunt-fingered hand belongs to the sensible, matter-of-fact, well-balanced class of humanity, such as the successful business and professional man or scientists."

"You have taper fingers and are something of an idealist," said the palmist, glancing at the reporter's busy fingers. The reporter had to own up.

"The spade-shaped fingers to my third class are possessed by men and women of strong passions, who love creature comforts, and have what I call material instincts.

"The joints on the hand are points that are very important in the study. If the top joint is longest it speaks broadly of ideality and lack of practical ability, making the possessor of the hand a dreamer. If the second joint be longest it denotes a keen, well balanced mind, and if the lowest joint excels in length the person who owns the hand is a utilitarian, with strong passions. If all three joints are equal, a well balanced mind is there.

"By my rules you will see that the first or topmost joint means the spiritual nature, the middle, mind or intellect, and the lower joint the body of the person. These rules may be thrown aside in the case of an uncommon hand. In that case the face aids us and a conclusion can be reached by that means."

"How do you read the lines of the hand?"

"That is the finest work of the whole. Two hands may be widely different, and their lines and shape may contradict the tales told by the fingers. Then only the instinct that comes with the true grasp of art can aid the palmist. To learn the chief lines of the hand is an easy matter. They are, first, the life-line, which runs round the base of the thumb, the head line, which begins alongside of the life line—sometimes running into or joining it—and crosses the middle of the palm, and the heart line, which crosses the hand somewhat diagonally near the base of the fingers.

"The lines that run round the wrist are age lines, each meaning thirty years of life. If the line of life be strong, deeply tinted and runs nearly unbrokenly to near the wrist, it is a sure sign that the owner of the hand will live a long, healthy life." The reporter looked at his hand, and may have laughed, for the operator first looked "nettled," and secondly at own the band, and said: Your days will be filled with sickness and will not be long." The scribe counted a knock down for the plamist, looked innocent and listened as she resumed her talk.

"If a spot or star lies on the life line it means that an eye or both will be lost, and every obstruction or cross on the surface means a misfortune graded as to the size. Have you wavy lines at your finger's ends? No! Then you'll not die of drowning."

"How about hanging?" asked the Heraldite.

"There is no especial line or mark for that," suspiciously, "but," warningly, "I can tell from general signs."

The questioner did not press the subject, and the lady went on: "A crescent-shaped mark below the little finger line denotes hereditary insanity, and a well defined short line, joining the line of life, indicates early or late marriage, according to the length of the line."

"Shall I become a Benedict."

"No sir! You will not!" emphatically. The reporter looked solemn, and was impressed with the words. He was already married. Resuming, the lady said: "If there are lines on the side of the hand below the little finger, the number of times married are indicated. The lines extending down between the third or ring finger and the little finger to the line of the heart number the loves of a life time." The interviewer's hand was extended, and the interviewer answered:

"Your loves will be four and short." The reporter figuratively hunted his hole again. "One line says the love will be single, long, and unalloyed. A long, well-defined line of the hand promises intellectuality. Yours is not long. If it extends over the sides of the hands, craft, meanness and calculation is indicated. One can not be possible without the other. In a good hand, if this line be forked or doubled at the end it is a sign of reticence or slyness. With a bad hand it means deception. A faint, short line shows stupidity. I said the line of the heart ran from one side of the hand to the other at the base of the fingers. If that is long, the hand belongs to a person who is affectionate. If short lines run down toward the main line, affection will only follow respect; and if the lines run up, passion and impulse are the mainsprings of love.

"Inconstancy follows the broken line of the heart. All these signs may be neutral, in which event a skilled palmist only can read them correctly. The left hand should be looked at for the signs of honor, wealth, loves, misfortunes, life's length, and health—because most unsue. Pale and wide lines tell of the absence of qualities that should be there. With a pale, wide line of the heart cruelty is allied, and clear ruddy lines of the left hand tell of a disposition like unto the mother's—physically and mentally."

"These are all the signs" went on [illegible] explainer, "but undersatnd me [illegible] when I say that physiog[illegible] clearly palmistry go hand in ha[illegible] omy and operator studies both [illegible] Unless an[illegible] never be successfu[illegible] he or she can [illegible] me above all wi[illegible] The eyes furnish I get a tent[illegible] my guide posts when embarra[illegible] al hand. NED'S STOCKING

It was a disreputable looking affair, as it hung over the heap of rags Ned called his bed. Any one but Santa Claus would have been dismayed at the yawning gulf which might once have been the toe, where only a narrow bridge separated it from the gaping heel; but the jolly little man only laughed in his sleeve, thinking what a sharp fellow Ned was to select this one; for such a stocking wouldn't hold trifles anyway. But you and I know that Ned could do no better, and its companion was in a yet more hopeless condition. If any one asks us who Ned is, I am afraid we shall have to confess that he is only a little Arab, and if he doesn't "silently steal away" it is not owing to any defect in his street education. Such training is not usually conducive to either mental, moral or physical health; in the latter item Ned did not lack anything, for he was hearty and robust a as young Esquimaux; quite too hearty, he felt sometimes, when his breakfast or supper had been scanty for often the supply was not equal to the demand. Morally he was not like other boys of his class; tenacious of his own rights, and I am sorry to say, somewhat inclined to be tenacious of the rights of others; for he had no very clear idea of the relative position of meum and teum. His code of honor was short and comprehensive: "An eye for an eye, and two teeth for one."

Mentally Ned was not an imbecile; he possessed a large share of native shrewdness, which perhaps stood him in place of a liberal education. Ned could read a little, of which acquirement he was very proud, and delighted to get a crowd of boys around him (forlorn little objects like himself) and read to them the news of to-day, or even several days ago, it mattered not to him or them—spelling his words painfully as he went along making the most ridiculous blunders, which, however, were received with unmoved gravity by his hearers. Ned lived with his father, or rather took care of him, for he, poor man, was such a slave to appetite, he was seldom seen in a condition to take care of himself. On rare days he would keep sober and work diligently at his trade, for he was an excellent mechanic; those days were rare, in another sense, to his friendless, motherless boy; for then they would have a grand supper together, and this father would sit beside him in the evening, smoking his pipe, and telling sweet stories of the old home and the times when they were all so happy—the time before he had been bound by the galling chain which the drunkard bears, the dear old times before his wife died of a broken heart.

There was a nestful of little ones then, but one by one they had gone to join the mother, and Ned and his father were left alone. Best of all, Ned liked to hear of their Christmas festivities, while he was too young to remember the nice dinner, the church-going, the merry games, the hanging of the little stockings, and once a Christmas tree. It was like a fairy tale to Ned, or something which had occurred in some other stage of existence. Thinking of these things, he resolved that not another Christmas eve should pass without giving his stocking a chance.

"Most anything would come handy," he soliloquized, looking dubiously at his ragged clothing and torn shoes; "I ain't always in full dress now, owing to the pressure, an' I can't afford to wear patent leather boots till times is a little easier."

So it happened that the glad Christmas came again and poor ragged Ned, although he had no part in the gladness and good cheer, could stand afar off, shivering and looking on, happy as a king, and, like a true philosopher, getting his share in seeing the enjoyment of others.

That night after he had hung that "once-upon-a-time" stocking and gone contentedly off to the land of dreams, the landlord's agent opened the door and stepped in. Some matter of business which he had forgotten during the day, brought him up to the third floor of the tenement house where Ned and his father lived or rather stayed. Mr. Henry saw his blunder and saw something else at the same time. He knew who the boy was, having some times employed him to do errands. Now he stepped softly forward and surveyed the place. There was brown-haired Ned curled up in his rags, sleeping quietly, with a flush of red glinting through the "browness of his cheeks:" there was the wretched stockings, and the ragged shoes stood side by side upon the floor. Mr. Henry was a soft-hearted man, too much so, perhaps, for a landlord's agent and he winked very fast as he stood looking at them, while something besides a smile shone on his face.

"Poor little fellow!" he said to himself, and, obeying a sudden impulse, he shut the door gently, went swiftly down the stairs, and hurried away to his happy, comfortable home.

What he said and did there on this particular occasions no affair of ours; we will only remark in passing, that he had a boy who was a year or two older than Ned who would outgrow his jackets.

When Ned opened his eyes the next morning he looked toward the stocking and—well, as he expressed it, "he hadn't any fault to find with Santa Claus' way of doin' thing'," but he laughed a gleeful, happy laugh at the picture before him. There, underneath the stocking, reposed against the wall, with its hat drawn over his face, a something which represented a boy about his own size. Its limp arms were pinned about a pie (which might be a mince pie) and a nice roasted chicken, wrapped in a clean cloth. Inside this suit of clothes there was another rather more worn, but all whole and clean; a pair of half-worn boots stood beside the image and the stocking was running over. Filling the awful rents were other socks, soft and warm; then came a few apples and oranges, like the red and gold of sunsets; a top, a pocket-knife and a wonderful, wonderful picture book, the like of which he had never dreamed of possessing; last but not least, a cake of toilet soap. Ned looked at it curiously and said to himself with arch gravity, "I guess I'll put that away for Sundays."

Mr. Henry had his own way of doing things, and he looked after Ned and gave him employment. More than this he looked after the wretched father with such an energy and kindness that he really had to reform. I want to say, for fear it may not be clearly understood, there is a moral in this story.

Personal Matters.

Alphonse Karr was lately a guest at a dinner of some homeopathic physicians at Paris; when, after toasts had been honored to Hahnemann and to the great lights of the science now living, he was asked to propose a toast. "Gentlemen," he said, "you have drunk the health of many physicians, but there is one toast you have forgotten. Permit me to repair this omission. I drink to the health of your patients."

Senator Hill, of Colorado, started out in life as a professor of chemistry in Brown University at Providence, R. I., and a few years ago went to Colorado to assay ores. One day a miner came to him with a nugget. Hill saw that it was gold. He wormed the location out of the man and made haste to get possession of the mine. It has made him a millionaire. Knowledge is power. So says the man who was juggled out of the mine.

Princess Louise took with her to England a rare and beautiful collection of Canadian birds. There are eight cases, containing about 120 varieties. Three cases are devoted to the different species of the duck family, and contain forty birds. Another is devoted to grouse, of which there are seventeen specimens, representing nine varities. The princess' own case is filled with small birds of brilliant plumage.

Speaker Carlisle is a very pale man, with brown hair, no whiskers or mustache, and with clean-cut features, indicating a very nervous organization. He is of the Greek type, having a long, straight nose, a handsome chin, prominent enough to indicate firmness, without obstinacy. He parts his hair on one side and brushes it in such a way as to give his head rather a square appearance. He does not dress badly, but neither does he dress well.

Mr. John Platt Bailey, of North Salem, Winchester county, N. Y., has brought suit in the Supreme Court against Ulysses S. Grant, Jr., for $1,000 damages. It is alleged that Mr. Grant keeps a vicious horse, and that on March 1st last the horse inflicted personal injuries upon Mr. Bailey, from which he is still suffering, and from which he never expects to recover. The horse complained of is one of the Arabian stallions presented to General Grant by the Khedive of Egypt.

A Mr. M. F. Wallace of Hillsboro, Ohio, had wooed and won as he thought, the heart of Miss Mary Barrett, and then went to California to make his fortune. A few days ago he returned to wed his betrothed. Thursday of last week was set for the happy event, and the minister and guests were assembled. In conversation with his affianced, Wallace mentioned that he was afraid his fortune was not sufficient to support her in the style she had been accustomed to. The lady replied that she had provided for herself for some time, and she supposed could still do so, and if he didn't want to marry her he could go. Forthwith he went. This sudden termination of the affair afforded the surprised guests plenty of opportunity for gossip.

Little Nellie Arthur, the president's daughter, has joined a Christmas club in Washington. About forty young people of both sexes are members of it. The object of the club is to make a merry Christmas for many poor people—poor children who scarcely know what the word means. The children solicit donations and prepare lists of the ones to be helped. When the president learned of the mission of the club he readily gave his consent to Nellie's joining it. She is now one of the leaders and has secured many donations by her pleasant smiles and pretty manners. The president has made a liberal contribution, and the club is becoming very popular.

Sensible to the Last.

The sympathies of German juries are frequently moved by sentiment. An instance of this occurred recently, when the will of a wealthy land owner, who had left everything to the maid of all work he had married, was contested upon the ground that she was superior in social standing, and had exercised undue influence to obtain the bequest. The widow was called to testify for herself, and proved to be as handsome as she was intelligent. "As to influencing my husband," she said, "in the disposition of his money, I never mentioned it to him. In the few years that we lived together, I never knew that he made a will. As to his last illness I remember his last words." Here she stopped. One of the lawyers asked her to say what they were. She replied that she would rather not; but the opposing counsel, making sure that her answer would be in favor of his clients insisted and urged that the law obliged her to do so. She then said: "He beckoned me to his side, and said 'Frederika, my dear, kiss me, and open the bottle of champagne, and let us take our last, farewell glass, for I am going to leave you." And she added, with a sob, 'we did, and he died.'" The jury returned a verdict for her in less than five minutes.

Egyptian Explorations.

The Rev. William C. Winslow, of Boston, has written an interesting letter to the Churchman of New York about the work of the Egyptian Exploration Fund Society of England. Last winter this society engaged in an important undertaking in the Delta, under the direction of M. Naville, the eminent Egyptologist—namely, the excavation of the Biblical city of Pithom, built by the Hebrews during their servitude. This city has been identified by the excavations as the "store city" built for Pharaoh during the oppression, and also as the city which is referred to as Succoth in the Bible. Interesting hieroglyphics and sun-dried bricks were found, some with, others without, straw. The society proposes during the present winter, if funds are forthcoming, to excavate San, the Zoan of the Bible, and the Tanis of the Greeks. That is where the Pharaoh lived who was the friend of Joseph, and is therefore the pla[illegible] in which to look for documents b[illegible] aring on the history of the Hebre[illegible] during their long sojourn in E[illegible]pt. It is likely that Hebrew monuments and sepulchres will be found in San. There also lies buried in the lost history of the Shepherd Kings. In fact no other site in Egypt, or in the whole east, is known to be so rich in buried monuments, numbers of which just show themselves on the surface of the mounds. And yet, it has been scarcely touched by the spade of the explorer. Americans who are interested in these excavations are invited to contriute to the fund.

WAITING TWENTY YEARS.

A Romantic Episode in the Lives of Two Lovers.

Correspondence of the New York Tribune.

At Coalton, Pa., a romantic episode in the lives of two lovers is at present exciting great interest in that vicinity. William Craig, a young farmer, and Mary Barker, the 18-year-old daughter of William Barker, also a farmer, were to have been married on Christmas Day, 1863. On the evening of the 7th of December, in the above-named year, there was a social party at Farmer Barker's house, and among the guests was a young man from this village. Miss Barker danced with him twice in succession, and young Craig reproved her for such marked attention to another, and told her that he did not wish her to dance again with the young man in question. This aroused the spirit of the young lady, and she replied that she would dance with him or anyone else she chose, and as many times as she liked. Craig then informed her that she might so so, but that she wouldn't see him again for twenty years. To this she tauntingly replied that "he couldn't stay away from her twenty hours if he tried ever so hard." Craig went home, and the next day he was missing. He lived with his parents, who were unable to find any trace of him. Miss Barker vowed she never would go into or receive company again until he returned. As years passed by and no traces of the missing son were received, his parents came to look upon him as dead. Miss Barker, however, had a singular faith that he would come back some day. She kept her vow as to living a secluded life, and few people ever saw her after the night she had quarreled with her lover.

Last Friday evening, which was the 7th instant, a stranger knocked at the door of old Mr. Barker's house and asked to see Miss Barker. He was a large, fine-looking man about forty years of age. He was admitted, and when Miss Barker appeared he held out his hand and said:

"Mary Barker didn't I tell you that you wouldn't see me again in twenty years?"

It was William Craig. He had returned to his parent's home in the afternoon. Both his father and mother were still living. The secret of his arrival was kept, and when he appeared in so dramatic a manner in the presence of his old sweetheart she fainted in his arms.

Craig's disappearance and long absence was that he had gone straight to Philadelphia after leaving home, and there enlisted in the army under an assumed name. He served until the end of the war, and was mustered out at Philadelphia. He longed very much to return home, but he permitted his determination to remain away twenty years to control him, and he went directly to Nebraska. There he took up a tract of land and went to farming, remaining there until the twenty years were up. He resolved to time his return and the meeting with his old sweetheart, if she was still alive and unmarried, at as near the hour of his leaving her as it was possible to do. He came back with an ample fortune, and found matters much as he had left them. The wedding that did not come off twenty years ago will be celebrated at the approaching Christmas.

Possum Hunting in Georgia.

Americus Recorder.

In a barber shop one day last week, while several gentleman were waiting to be shaved, conversation turned on good things to eat. After discussing various dishes, Joe Roney, who is considered a connoisseur, and who had taken an active part in the discussion, said:

"Well, boys, you can talk about nice things to eat, but the best thing in the world I ever tasted was possum, hedged in brown gravy and sweet potatoes, with sugar on them." Mr. Walt Furlow invited us soon after to go out to his plantation and assist in a genuine old fashioned possum hunt, with an hour or two for the squirrels thrown in. The first night's experience was a tame one; we got into a dry place of wood and struck but one possum track, but we got that possum.

The next night, between eight and nine o'clock, we started out. Down the road we went, stopping long enough to get a few handfuls of good lighter, and then into the forest. Scarcely fifteen minutes had elapsed before a bark was heard, succeeded a few moments later by another, and another. A trail had been struck. The voices of the dogs grew more frequent until at length a long continued bay from the ringleader announced that the possum was treed. A few moments' walk brought us to him, but the scene around the tree baffles description. With bark after bark, the dogs circled around, trying in vain to climb up the sapling. A few blows from the ax brought the tree down, and the next moment the possum was in the jaws of the dogs, forty feet away. He had started to run as soon as the tree fell, but the dogs ran too quickly. As soon as they had a taste of him they were satisfied. It is remarkable, but a possum dog will never eat a possum or the bones of one.

The same scene was repeated twice more, varied by long tramps through swamps, cotton and corn fields. The small hours of the morning had arrived when we went to bed, but we consoled ourselves with the thought of the feast we would have next day.

On a big dish in the center of the table, brown and fat, the 'possum looked good, but it was better than it looked. It was meat fit for kings, but which anybody could have for the trouble of the hunt. It was the first possum we ever ate.

Joe Roney was right. These is nothing that will beat the possum.

Alleged Supernatural Gifts.

One of the most remarkable cases of the exercise of alleged supernatural gifts has recently been unearthed by a correspondent in Shropshire, England. Emma Davies, a young nurse girl but thirteen years old, sighed to conquer other worlds beside the somewhat limited one over which she presided, and one night resolved to strike out in an original line. She heard her companions speaking of moving chairs and tables, and furniture of all kinds mysteriously, by dexterity of the hand, and practiced the art until she became proficient enough to announce herself as a full-fledged medium. She went around among the credulous peasantry practicing the deception, and her fame spread. Upon the slighest pretext the deeds of the little nurse girl were magnified, and the child, finding herself the observed of all observers, with some degree of cleverness jerked about books, buckets and small articles of furniture. Tales of pigs standing on their heads when she commanded, rats and mice appearing from their recesses and other wonderful stories brought down upon her the more enlightened reporter, and after he had witnessed some of her alleged supernatural powers, he quietly exposed the whole thing. Miss Davies has fled, no one knows whither.

The school returns of Ohio, just completed, show that the number of children of school age in the state during the past year was 1,068,200 a decrease of nearly 13,000 over the number of the previous year, which was 1,081,321. Now, one would suppose there was an increase of illiteracy or that there were causes for dislike in schools, but it was neither. It arose from the operation of a new law framed to prevent the making of false returns for the purpose of obtaining a larger amount of money for school purposes. And this in Ohio!

The reason why so many die with consumption, is because they neglect to use the proper remedy in season. When the system is first attacked with a cough, oppression of the chest, or seated pains in the breast, Allen's Lung Balsam will cause the phlegm to raise, heal the irritated parts, and restore the system to health.

Another Life Saved.

Mrs. Harriet Cummings, of Cincinnati, Ohio, writes: Early last winter my daughter was attacked with a severe cold which settled on her lungs. We tried several medicines, none of which seemed to do her any good, but she continued to get worse, and finally raised large amounts of blood from her lungs. We called in a family physician, but he failed to do her any good. We then called in a physician—a most skillful professor in one of our colleges—he said that she could not get well. At this time a friend who had been cured by Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam For The Lungs, advised me to give it a trial. We then got a bottle, and before she had used it all up she began to improve, and by the use of three bottles was entirely cured.

FOR LADIES.

I have been using for a month or two in my household, Swift's Specific (S. S. S.), the greater portion of it having been consumed by the female portion of my family, and with the happiest results. It acted like a charm on my wife, who had been in bad health for a long time, and for whom I had paid hundreds of dollars for doctors and medicines. It began to build her up from the first dose. Another female member of my family took it with equally satisfactory results. It is certainly the best tonic for delicate ladies that I have ever used, and I have tied them all. I have no doubt that want of exercise, close confinement in poorly ventilated houses, sewer gas poison and malarial poison often produce sickness among our wives, daughters and sisters, and I believe Swift's Specific is the remedy for all this sort of blood poisoning.

FIELD AND FARM.

Farming Paragraphs.

Coal-tar when mixed with about one-tenth part of air-slaked lime, makes a very good covering for a shingle roof. It should be made hot and the lime well stirred in and put on with a brush.

In his report the governor makes the following estimate of the number and value of cattle and sheep in Montana, in October, 1883: Number of cattle, 475,000, valued at $30 per head, $14,250,000; number of sheep, 700,000, value $3 per head, $21,000,000; number of horses, 90,400, at $75 per head, value, $687,500. Twenty-five thousand head of imported breeds of cattle have been brought into the territory this year, also some of the finest racing and trotting stock.

A poultry-house should be large enough to be airy, but if it is kept strictly clean and sweet it will do no harm to be somewhat crowded. A house 24 feet long, 10 feet wide, 5 feet high behind and 8 feet in front, and having four roosting poles, all on a level and only a foot from the floor, will hold 60 to 80 fowls. This manner of arranging the roosts prevents a good deal of quarrelling to get on the top perch.

Fifty-seven farmers contribute 20,000 pounds of milk per day to the Anglo-Swiss condensing works, in Middletown, N. Y., which occupy a three-story building 250x110 feet, are driven by a sixty-horse-power engine, and give employment to sixty persons, including boys and girls. The sugar passes from a large bin into the milk before the latter reaches the vacuum-pans; other labor-saving devices are nailing-machines (used in the manufacture of boxes,) soldering machines in the tin-shop (where 60,000 cans can be made in a day) and electric bells. The company, which also runs six factories in Europe, disposed last year, of 32,000,000 cans of condensed milk.

The most convenient way of keeping celery in the winter in the cellar, and one as good as any, is to pack the plants as they are taken out of the ground, with all the soil adhering, and as closely as possible, in boxes or barrels of such a depth that the tops are even with the edge of the box. In this way the stalks are blanched and are kept fresh and succulent. The boxes should be put in the coolest part of the cellar. And the way is to pack the plants in a similar manner in trenches in the ground half as deep as the plants are long; put boards on each side and earth up against the boards; then cover the whole with straw. Freezing does not injure celery, but rather improves it, making it tender and sweet.

Cooking Recipes.

Rye Bread.—Make sponge as for wheat bread; let it rise over night; then mix up with rye flour, not as stiff as wheat bread. Place in baking pans; let rise, and bake half an hour longer than wheat bread.

A Dish for Breakfast.—Take six good cooking apples, cut them in slices one-fourth of an inch thick; have a pan of fresh, hot lard ready, drop the slices in and fry till brown; sprinkle a little sugar over them and serve hot.

Fried Potatoes.—Chop fine cold boiled potatoes; heat some butter in a frying pan and put the potatoes in. A few minutes before taking them from the fire stir in some well-beaten egg. Serve hot.

Rabbit on Toast.—Cut cold rabbit in pieces and fry brown with slices of bacon or ham, and half its quantity of small onions or mushrooms, and stew them until tender in hot water enough to cover; put in plenty of pepper and salt, and serve on toast. Should be stewed slowly.

Lemon Pies.—Boil and chop six lemons after the seeds have been removed; add three cupfuls of sugar, three cupfuls of molasses and three pounded crackers; mix well together and bake between two crusts like mince pies.

Chocolate Caramels—Mix well together two cups of molasses, two-thirds of a cup of sugar, half a cup of milk, half a cup of Baker's chocolate, grated, and a piece of butter as large as an egg. Boil about half an hour, pour in buttered pans, and just before it is cool square it.

Cocoanut.—One cup of desiccated cocoanut, one pint of milk, two eggs, and a little salt. Scald the cocoanut in part of the milk, to soften, then add the rest, with the eggs and sugar to taste. Bake in one crust as custard. If the whites of the eggs are left out to frost the pie, it will improve it.

The Wire Fight in Iowa.

What is generally known as the "Barbed Wire Monoply" put up the price of its goods to 10 and 11 cents per pound, and found a troublesome competitor in the Farmers' Protective Association of Iowa, which established a co-operative factory and supplied to its members an equal quality of popular fencing material at 6 and 7 cents, gaining a fair profit on its manufacture even at that rate. Since then there has been much litigation, in which Iowa farmers were successful, and there is more to follow within a month or two, for which funds are needed. An earnest effort is making to raise the money; the agricultural and local journals of the state are giving urgent attention to the subject—for instance, four and one half columns in the current number of the Iowa Homestead—and spirited public meetings are being held, farmers naturally supposing that defeat now, in the final struggle, would mean a speedy return to what they regard as "the old extortion."

For the Native Cows.

We will hazard the following statement, made from what we think adequate experience and knowledge, viz., that a herd of fair, average native cows, costing $60 or $70 each, will make a greater profit in butter every year, with as good feeding and management, as the same number of these vaunted Guernseys costing $150 to $300 will do. Further, that in the 12,000 or 15,000 Jersey cows in the country there are more of them making three pounds of butter in a week than in as many native cows. At the same time, we are ready to admit that it might be difficult to match the 40 Jersey cows which have been said to yield 14 to 20 pounds of butter a week with natives, for there has been an honest reticence in regard to lying about our native cows. Moreover, it is not the quantity of butter which a cow yields that makes the profit, and 7 pounds a week from a seventy-five-dollar native cow will pay much better than 14 pounds a week from a fifteen-hundred-dollar Jersey cow. So the dairy men may still live on in the belief that the person who wrote the above statement is "a little off."—New York Times.

For the Man of the House.

A word to thoughtless husbands and others to whom the remarks apply: Your wife wants that front, sunny window for her plants. Don't object to it, for she is entitled to it. Go to work like a man and fit it up for her. She wants a capacious shelf or tray secured on a level with the window sill. If you can't make it for her, get some one who can. She wants a few earthen flower pots to replace those old tin cans and wooden paint kegs and boxes in which she has been obliged to put some of her plants. It is your business to buy them for her, or give her the money to do it with. Then she needs six or eight flower-pot brackets that come for the purpose, to screw on the sides of the window casing, having a revolving arm, just the thing, and very cheap. Get them without a word and see how surprised she will be. If you see a pretty rustic hanging basket, or one of wire, buy that also. Take the whole lot home and and leave the rest to your wife and daughters. If you don't appreciate flowers yourself, keep still about it and try to disguise the unfortunate fact as well as you can. You may be thankful to get on with such trifling expenditures; you ought in reality to provide her with a bay window for her plants if your new house has none already.—Rural New Yorker.

A Widow's Dress.

From the Evening Post.

A very elegant evening dress, lately worn by a young widow in this city, was composed of dead black mourning satin de Lyon, made in princess style, with a court train falling in superb unbroken folds from the waist. Around the foot of this train was a double box pleating about eight inches long, of black Indian silk gauze, with a handsome jet ornament set between each full pleating. Down the front of the dress from the throat to the skirt hem was laid a tablier, formed of pleating of the black gauze—having the "blouse" effect over the bust—curving narrowly at the belt, the enlarging into panels below the waist. Down the center of each of these panels were set at intervals a number of magnificent cut jet medallion ornaments of rare design and value. Special jet ornaments were placed upon the short elbow sleeves, and a Vandyke collar covered with a scintillating mass of jet work, half covered the shoulders of the fair lady. The effect of this jet garniture in the gaslight was exceeding beautiful. A large Portia fan of pale mauve feathers, and a pair of Louis XIV sandals of black satin, embroidered in jet, and worn over pale mauve silk stockings, with dressed kid gloves of a shade to match, completed a costume at once striking and recherche.

Sweet Minded Women.

So great is the influence of a sweet-minded woman on those around her that it is almost boundless. It is to her that friends come in season of sorrow and sickness for help and comfort; one soothing touch of her kindly hand works wonders in the feverish child; a few words let fall from her lips in the ear of a sorrowing sister do much to raise the load of grief that is bowing its victim down to the dust in anguish. The husband comes home worn out with the pressure of business, and feeling irritable with the world in general; but when he enters the cozy sitting-room, and sees the blaze of the bright fire, and meets his wife's smiling face, he succumbs in a moment to the soothing influence which act as the balm of Gilead to his wounded spirits. We are all wearied with combating with the stearn realities of life. The rough school-boy flies in a rage from the taunts of his companions to find solace in his mother's smile; the little one, full of grief with its own large trouble, finds a heaven of rest on its mother's breast; and so one might go on with instances of the influence that a sweet-minded woman has in the social life with which she is connected. Beauty is an insignificant power when compared with hers.—Ex.

Not the least important report of the recommendations of the president's message is that relative to the preservation of forests. Attention has frequently been called to the wastefulness of stripping the waters of the country's rivers of their natural protection, and it is generally admitted that this same denudation is an important factor in the floods and low water of western streams. The suggestion in the message is the reservation of certain public lands in Montana for a forest preserve. The region is unsuitable for settlement, but includes within its borders the sources of many of the tributaries of the Missouri, Columbia and Saskatchewan rivers. By preserving the forests on these feeding streams it is thought the agricultural future of the land on the main streams will be secured. It is simply a matter of withdrawing from the public sale a tract of little value except for its wood, and vigilantly guarding it from speculation. The effects could hardly be apparent for many years, especially as the land to be protected is now but sparsely settled. A successful experiment by the nation, however, might lead to more vigorous state action in the same direction. The New York chamber of commerce already asks that the state should appropriate and preserve the Adirondack forest, lest it should be stripped of its timber, and the Hudson, Mohawk and other rivers, which take their rise in that wooded mountain region should be dried up.

It is a most favorable business indication that the exchanges in seventeen out of twenty-seven cities reporting their clearings for the week ending December 8 show an increase, while nine only show a decrease as compared with the corresponding week of last year. Outside of New York the increase in the clearings is 9.6 per cent. New York shows a decrease of 17.0 per cent. The report is properly looked upon as very favorable.

Foreign journals are said to be the most struck with that portion of the president's message which shows the great amount of surplus revenue. The vast wealth and extraordinary prosperity of the United States are strikingly indicated by the fact that the people willingly tax themselves for such a prodigious annual revenue, and are not distressed or even much discontented when the revenue is greatly larger than the necessities of the government demand.

There is a retaliation resolution in the House, on Germany, for refusing to receive American hog products. The resolution proposes to prohibit the importation of any German product which the president, by the advice of experts, shall deem injurious to health. It is supposed that wines, liquors, etc., from Germany may be brought under the ban. They amount to a vast sight more than our hog exports, the aggregate of which is less than 7,000,000.

George Eliot on Servants.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

Some eighteen years ago we published in this journal an article by the late George Eliot on servants' logic, which, if it had appeared under her name, would have received much more notice than that which was actually accorded it. Nor did many people know at the time that the foremost of female novelists was among the contributors to this journal. The article, although, perhaps, not in George Eliot's best style, is nevertheless sufficiently characteristic to induce us to reproduce it in our columns to day. After describing the dismay with which a hostess discovers that the scalloped oysters with which she would fain load a friend's plate have been served with their beards on, and the troubles of a dyspeptic physiologist with a weakness for spinach who has vainly endeavored to impress on the cook the importance of thoroughly squeezing green vegetables, the writer proceeds:

Again, you desire soup, but desire it without fat. You are perhaps a genius; the world is in need of your new poem; or you are evolving a momentous theory, and the evolution of fatty acids within you is a serious impediment. your mental activity is reduced to the consciousness that interesting facts in animal chemistry are going on within you; you begin to think you can serve mankind only by leaving your body for dissection. At length you ask your wife, with hardly suppressed peevishness, and unusual emphasis on "my dear," to inquire into the making of the soup. Your wife, who is rather frightened at the cook, tells her that Mr. Queasy, in spite of his orders, discerned fatty particles in his soup yesterday. "It's a thing impossible there can be fat, mum—for skimming and everything—there's nothing neglected in my power." "Show me your cold stock." Exit Sally, returning with a vessel in one hand and a spoon in the other. There is a white film of fat over the surface of the stock. "See, now, Sally, there is fat." "La, mum," says Sally, plunging her spoon in and turning up the jellied soup from beneath as a gardner turns the soil when he is digging for the roots, the cold fatty getting underneath in the process "that's nothing; besides I take my soup from under and I take the fat off with a spoon." (The spoon itself is studded plenteously with fragments of cold fat.) "But unless you wash your spoon each time you dip it there will be fat, and however little Mr. Queasy suffers from it. Besides"—(Mrs. Q. here exerts all her courage)—it belongs to a good cook to send up her soup free from fat." Sally smiles bitterly. "La mum, do you think when I was at Nuneham gate, and there was people of all sorts coming to the house, as I could have give that satisfaction—and Scotch people wanting things you might think no Christain 'ud touch—and Mr. Tooley, the gentleman with the wooden leg, praising my soup, and saying he never tasted better? But there's stomachs will not stand soup, and that's where it is." (Here Sally shakes her head and sighs, as is her wont when she is seeing deeply into the cause of things.) "And as I've said to Jane many and many's the time, if gentle folks' constitutions are of that sort, it's no wonder what comes. I said so only yesterday, when I was draining the rice, and the cat eating the white sauce all the while, and me not knowing. It's true what I speak—every word." Here Sally sets down the vessel of stock emphatically, and tapping the outside of it with her finger-ends, looks hard out of the window. Mrs. Queasy is non-plussed. If she says more Sally will give warning; she draws her dress round her crinoline, and rustles up stairs again.

Servants are rich in intuitions. They have vast numbers of certainties which are deep by reason of their groundlessness. The postman brings a letter for Maria; she was sure he would, she didn't know from whom it would come, and if you were to knock her down she couldn't tell you why, but this morning when she got out of bed, and drew up the blind and saw the wind blowing the leaves about, she seemed to see the postman coming with the letter in his hand. You make a great mistake if you suggest certain conditions which might have given rise to the expectation. She rejects such low-minded analysis of her certainty. No; there was no reason why she should expect a letter this morning more than any other; but so it was—and it was the same once before, when the dish-cover fell and got bruised; she had said at breakfast something would happen that day, she knew. But as to your certainties, for which you allege arguments, the same Maria considers them offensive unless they are to be overcome by her assertion. If you will not believe that a looking-glass is cloudy and spotty in spite of daily, dilligent rubbing, or that the steel of all your variously procured stoves happens to be of so peculiar a quality that it will not "take" a polish, she thinks she has a right to feel offended. If, however, she happens to be in a good humor, she will perhaps observe apropos of the steel, that at one place where she lived there was a bright fender with a sharp edge, and the nurse let the child fall on it and cut herself; and when she has given you all the circumstances attendant on this event, the name of the doctor who was called in and what he said, she will feel that she has readjusted her position as a polisher of stoves.

On the whole, servants are little disposed to think that the opinions of gentlefolks can have any practical value for them. Our remedies, our methods, our explanations, are like the drapery and tailoring we pay so much for, they correspond to the supposed scale of our income; but servants, for their part, get their stuffs and their views from other quarters. The cure for a gentleman's toothache is not likely to suit Sally's molar so well as the cure recommended by the grocer's boy on the authority of his first cousin, who went about with a blue handkerchief round his head for weeks and weeks. And for the probabilities concerning the dryness of the coming summer, or the guilt of the man last taken for murder, the person to be consulted with the most deference is the laundress who serves very good families, and whose husband is in the carrying line.

The moral of all this is that wise masters and mistresses will not argue with their servants, will not give them reasons, will not consult them. A mild yet firm authority which rigorously demands that certain things be done without urging motives or entering into explanations is both preferred by the servants themselves and is the best means of educating them into any improvement of their methods and habits. Authority and tradition are the chief, almost the only, safe guards of the uninstructed—are the chief means of developing the crude mind, whether childish or adult. Reason about everything with your child, you make him a monster, without reverence, without affections. Reason about things with your servants, consult them, give them suffrage, and you produce no other effect in them than a sense of anarchy in the house; a suspicion of irresoluteness in you, the most opposed to that spirit of order and promptitude which can alone enable them to fill their places well and make their lives respectable.

C. B. Wickham & Co., bankers of Tioga, Pa., have failed. A judgment has been entered against them for $80,000.

Gov. Hubbard sees no reason for a special session of the legislature yet.

"SHE IS MY WIFE, SIR."

A Pennsylvania Blue Blood Outwitted by a Pittsburg Dentist.

Trenton Special to New York Journal.

A short distance from this city is the country residence of William H. Rawle, the distinguished Philadelphia lawyer, a handsome mansion with extensive grounds, which played its share as a rendezvous in a recent romance that has until now not only been kept from the newspapers, but has also been kept a secret from the select social circles in which one of the actors moved. Mr. Rawle prides himself on being one of the bluest of blue-blooded Americans, descended from the stock of patrician revolutionary patriots. His great grandfather was a "Signer," or something of that sort, while his grandfather was a chief justice of the Keystone state. He himself was a prominent candidate for the attorney generalship in the last Pennsylvania state election, and is a man of great wealth, culture and the widest social connections.

The present Mrs. Rawle is his second wife. By his first wife he had two lovely daughters, who inherited independent fortunes from their mother, which gave them an income variously stated at from $6,000 to $10,000 a year each. The relations between these young ladies and their stepmother have been such that they have not spent much time in each other's society. The daughters have made their home at their father's place near this city.

One morning in the last week of October Mr. Rawle was in his Philadelphia law office, when a card was handed him. It bore the name of "Dr. L. Godfrey Rosseau, Pittsburg."

When the owner of the name was ushered into the dignified presence he was asked to state his business.

"I called to see you Mr. Rawle," said the visitor with some slight hesitation, "about a rather delicate matter, which does not effect me alone, and concerning which I am authorized to speak. I want to marry your daughter!"

"Who are you, sir, that dare come to me in this way?" he demanded.

"I am a dentist by profession. I have a good practice and am earning a good living. I am amply able to care for two people. I am thirty years of age and my home is in Pittsburgh. I love your daughter—"

"This is a piece of blankey-blinkey-blanked ridiculous nonsense, sir!"

"But we are engaged to be married and—"

"Get out of my office!" shouted Mr. Rawle, fairly purple with rage.

Metaphorically, if not literally, kicked out, the doctor from Pittsburgh took his departure, with the quiet remark:

"You will hear from me again, sir."

The more Mr. Rawle thought of his unwelcome visitor and his audacious errand, the more uneasy he grew. He hurried off and caught the next train for New York. There is a special station for his country place, a short distance from Trenton. When he reached his suburban mansion he asked for the elder daughter, Miss Edith Rawle. He was told she had driven to Trenton a short time before with a strange gentleman. In hot haste he followed, taking the train from his local station. As he stepped from the train, which was bound for Jersey City, Dr. Rosseau and Mr. Rawle's daughter sprang on board. Mr. Rawle saw them too late to regain the train he had just quitted, as Dr. Rosseru waved an exasperating adieu from the platform. Mr. Rawle followed the fugitives, and on reaching New York at once employed detectives to track the dentist and his daughter. The same evening one of the detectives reported that he had found the runaway lovers at the St. Nicholas. Mr. Rawle reached the caravansary and nervously glancing down the last page of arrivals read:

"Dr. L. Godfrey Rosseau and wife, Pittsburgh."

He sent up his card to Mrs. Rosseau. After a short delay Dr. Rosseau came tripping down the steps with Mr. Rawle's card poised between his thumb and forefinger. The tables had been turned since mouring.

"Mr. Rawle?" he said, as though in doubt as to the identify of his caller.

"Yes, sir! I want to see my daughter!"

"Oh, yes; I believe I had the pleasure of meeting you somewhere recently."

"I want to see my daughter, sir!"

"I am really very sorry, but she doesn't receive at this hour."

"But she's my daughter, sir, and I demand to see her!"

"She is my wife, sir! I'm very sorry, but you cannot see her!"

And he did not see her, nor has he seen her since. Dr. Rosseau and Miss Rawle were married and have gone to Pittsburg to live. The wedding announcement was inserted by the happy husband in a Philadelphia paper. The facts as to the brief acquaintance and the rather terse relations between Mr. Rawle and his dentist son-in-law are now for the first time promulgated for the enjoyment of the upper ten thousand.

He Had Him, Bald-Headed.

From the Boston Traveller.

They were two solid citizens. One was bald, but rejoiced in a fine luxuriant beard. The other had a heavy growth of hair on the head, but was very bald to his chin. The bald-chinned citizen was a very talkative individual, whose conversation was rapid and incessant. Meeting the bald-headed citizen one day in a company of gentlemen, he opened fire on him touching the bareness of his sconce. "What do you suppose," said he, in his rattling, vivacious way, "what do you suppose, neighbor, is the reason that you have no hair on your head, and so much on your chin?" "Well," said the other, very deliberately, "scientists say that men who work with their brains create such a heat in the scalp that the hair is worn off." "That sounds like a likely theory," chinned in the loquacious citizen. "Yes, it does," returned the other, "and I think your case is a striking illustration of its probability. Now you have plenty of hair on your head, but none on your chin, which just backs up the scientific theory, because all your work is done with your jaws—there's nothing done on top."

An Emergency.

A few days ago a man with humble expression and wearing a summer suit of clothes applied to one of the railroad passenger agents for a dead-head pass to Toledo. "Why do you want to go to Toledo?" "To get married." "And you haven't any money?" "Not above twenty-five cents." "Hadn't you better be worth your fare to Toledo before taking a wife on your hands to support?" "You don't understand the case," persisted the man, "I'm going to marry a widow worth at least $5,000, and the first thing I shall do will be to remit you the price of a ticket. I'm poor, and the widow knows it, but she marries me for love." He protested so long and earnestly that he was finally passed down the road. Two days elapsed and then a letter was received from him saying: "Heaven bless you for your kindness! Reached here all right, and married the widow according to programme. It turns out that she isn't worth a copper. In this emergency may I ask you to pass us both to Detroit, where I have hopes of striking a job?"—Detroit Free Press.

He Denounced Him.

Erastus Groggins was possessed of the most vituperative tongue in the whole town of Tackville, and Mr. Groggins invariably allowed it plenty of exercise. A certain political enemy of Mr. Groggins had recently published a card in the local paper severely antagonistic to Mr. Groggins, and Groggins immediately declared that he had been villified.

"I shall denounce him," said Mr. Groggins, quietly.

The population of Tackville paled with apprehension.

"Shall you publish a card in reply?" ventured a bystander.

"No, sir," said Mr. Groggins, "I shall only publicly denounce him."

A malarial chill then settled on the town of Tackville. The unfortunate enemy of Mr. Groggins was to be denounced.

One evening the two belligerents met in a grocery store. The election news was coming in fast from the back counties, and the congregation was noisily engaged in discussing live issues, explaining away defeats and rejoicing over victories. Until the entrance of his enemy, Mr. Groggins was unusually quiet and sedate. It is quite doubtful if the enemy would have entered had he been aware that Mr. Groggins was present—and loaded, Mr. Groggins said.

"Mr. Crumbach, you probably weighed the question of publishing that card long and carefully before deciding to insert it?"

"I did, sir," replied Mr. Crumbach, rather uneasily. "I think that I devoted to it due consideration and careful deliberation."

"Yes, I trust that you gave it the necessary thought and attention which so grave a subject demanded. I cannot but think, Mr. Crumbach, that your motive is giving utterance to the stories that I was tarred and feathered in Houston, committed bigamy in Laredo, and jumped a board bill in Galveston was mainly to do me a personal injury, and, possibly, reflect on my character as a citizen and a member of society."

"Yes," replied Mr. Crumbach, "I must admit that such was my intention, and if I failed in any way to do the subject full justice, it was more an error of the head than of the heart. I endeavored to state the facts in as plain and concise form as possible, and allow the public to frame its own opinion."

"Yes, I have not the least doubt of that," continued Mr. Groggins, sternly, "and I intend this evening in the presence of these prominent members of the first society of Tackville, to publicly denounce you, the vile, insinuating author of this literary prevarication. I should, Mr. Crumbach, be utterly remiss to the duties owing to my station as a citizen, and the home of my family, should I neglect this favorable opportunity. Mr. Crumbach, are you ready?"

"Proceed," said Crumbach, uneasily shifting his position from a nail keg to the top of a cracker barrel.

"All right" said Mr. Groggins. "To commence with, I consider you a cur, a hidebound, treacherous whelp which daily roams these streets in foul pursuit of the offal of slander upon which you have ever fed since childhood's idiotic hours. Unowned, unclaimed, and masquerading under another name than that bestowed on you by uncertain parentage in the days of profligate youth, you haunt the purlieus of the lowest barrel house and rejuvenate the bar room cuspidors for a morning toddy. The poisonous exhalation from the deadly upas tree are fragrant as the perfume of the rose compared to the vile breath of slander with which you seek to blast the name and fame of those as far surperior to you in all which goes to form the majesty of man, as the highest, snow-capped mountain peaks are above the green scum of the lowest swamps."

The face of Mr. Groggins was fairly livid as he reached this part of his address, and his fingers convulsively opened, and again the nails sank deep into the palms of his hands. Mr. Crumbach shifted his position from the cracker barrel back on to the nail keg.

"Yes," said Mr. Groggins, "present appearances seems to indicate that you are correct, but I not only desire to address you, but also that scowling fiend of a boon companion of yours, just behind your back."

Mr. Crumbach turned his head. Alas, poor Crumbach! Hastily realizing his indiscretion, his eyes once more sought those of Mr. Groggins, but between him and Groggins' stern, relentless face gleamed a nickle-plated machine known as a "bull dog," and Mr. Groggins had the drop. A murmur of pleased surprise ran over the crowd.

"That was a good move," remarked one enthusiast.

"Yes, that was exceedingly well played," assented another admirer of the game. "I wonder what Crumbach will do next?"

The two belligerents glared at each other. But the overtures of war were not eventuated by them. A wildly inspired cowboy, occupying a position in the rear, sent a bullet crashing through a glass jar of pickles sitting on the top shelf, and then the trouble commenced. Revolver barrels waved in the air like the glistening autumn grain on the hillside. A dense blue smoke permeated the narrow confines of the dingy grocery, while shrieks, groans and bitter imprecations rose above the wild, discordant din of battle. Political excitement ran high. A large congregation on the outside cheered the battling hosts within. And when all was over, when the dust and smoke of battle rolled and curled along the blackened, dingy ceiling of the room, eight wounded men were carried out into the open air, and laid on coffee-sacks.

Messrs. Groggins and Crumbach were discovered curled up in the cold embrace of death under the counter, lashed each to each as the tiger lashes himself to his prey, and their hearts' blood mingled in a crimson, turbid stream along the grimy floor.

Mr. Groggins had denounced his enemy.—Texas Siftings.

The papers assert that the country is now passing through an epidemic of crime, and their various columns sustain the assertion. All agree that the ease with which criminals are able to evade the officers of the law or to escape the punishment prescribed for offences, has done much to encourage and embolden men prone to commit acts of villainy. It is plainly evident that more efficient legal means than we now have must be resorted to to stamp out this carnival of crime that is now sweeping over our land. The inefficiency of our constabulary forces and the recognized leniency of the courts and pardoning power in certain sections of the country, have, in many instances, afforded a pretext for the people to take the law into their own hands, and add to other offenses that of lynching. When scoundrels are made to understand that retribution will speedily and almost certainly follow their offending, many of them will abandon their life of crime, and we shall witness a return to peace and security. The subject is one demanding serious public attention.

COUNT VON MOLTKE.

The German Napoleon, Who Moves Men As He Moves Chess-Pieces.

From the London Times, Oct. 27.

Marshal von Moltke won his great renown so late in life that to many he is still a new general, though he reached his 84th birthday yesterday. His fame remains fresh also be cause the Franco-German war, now thirteen years distant still seems so recent. The world has not yet grown accustomed to the immense changes caused by the military events of 1870-71. After Napoleon I.'s downfall France's credit as a soldier-nation stood unimpaired. One of her poets could say; "How many were you against the dying eagle?" and another wrote no more than truth when he compared his vanquished country to a wounded lion, round which huntsmen gather half afraid and saying, "Il bouge!" But in the last mighty struggle, which begun on the Rhin and ended in Paris, the two giant powers stood alone, hand to hand, with apparently equal chances and the defeat of France, the agressor, was swift, overwhelming and discreditable. No such sudden collapse of a great empire could ever have been predicted; no such wholesale leading into captivity of generals and legions was over witnessed. Yet it is a curious thing that Von Moltke, the chief hero of the surprising war, does not enjoy a reputation like that which Wellington held after Waterloo, and it would be useless to pretend that the German generals who shared his triumphs are as well known as some of the French commanders whom they worsted.

Most people would be puzzled to describe the achievements of Gen. von Kameke, now Prussian war minister, who was chief engineer in the siege operations round Paris; or those of Gen. von Werder, who, with 40,000 men, routed Bourbaki's 140,000 after a three days' battle, performing what the Emperor William styled "one of the greatest feats of arms in history." The French make more noise in the world than other people, and they have used their far-reaching voices to diminish the victories of their enemies by making them appear to have been won too easily, and not over France, but over a faction whose misrule betrayed France. But, for all this, men who have studied the history of the Franco-German war know that the triumphs of Von Moltke and his generals are not dimmed by any tales of French weakness. The advance of the German armies over France was like the impetus of a man skating—one false step would have brought a heavy fall—and Von Moltke was not admirable only in having drafted and executed point for point the most elaborate plan of campaign ever conceived, but in having accurately foreseen all the demoralizing effects which defeat would produce upon his foes. Had he made any miscalculation; had the French shown spirit when he expected them to be cowed; had they resisted stubbornly when he had reckoned that they would yield—the end of the war might have been very different from the beginning. More than once the silent commander must have been anxious in spirit; but he let nothing of this be seen. A foreigner who called upon him at Versailles in the midst of the seige of Paris, and on a day when a great sortie was expected, found him quietly reading an English novel.

He is an extraordinary man. A diplomatist who met him in the Wilhelmstrasse of Berlin the day before he went to the seat of war would have taken leave of him in a hurry supposing that he must be busy; but Von Moltke said: "I have nothing to do," and went on chatting with his usual composure. In this incident was revealed the whole strength of the German military system, which allots to each officer just as much work as he can easily and efficiently perform. The formula of the whole system may be defined as the constant search after able men; and, as the princes of the royal house of Prussia have steadily adhered to the principle of letting merit be recompensed and incompetency shelved without favor or fear, they have been contributors equally with the best of their generals towards the events which have made Germany what it now is. The organization of the German army has in it much that produces awe as well as admiration on foreign minds. The staff office in Berlin, over which Marshall von Moltke presides, has departments as mysterious and inquisitorial as those of the Roman curia; and the place is in fact a military inquisition. Maps of all countries and cities of Europe are there, with plans of invading these localities, and minute details as to the accommodations which the invaders would find in the way of board and lodging. When Gen. von Goben, at the head of the Eighth army crops, marched into Rouen, he astounded the inhabitants by sending out, within half an hour of his entry, adjutants who marked on the door of each house the number of billets it was to furnish. Protests were of no use. The general had his instructions concerning what each house could do and must do, and he knew, moreover, that the city was in a position to supply 40,000 pairs of boots, 10,000 flannel waistcoats and 10,000 good cigars to his men at twenty-four hours notice. Perhaps the staff officer has thoroughly considered the capabilities of London in the same manner.

Marshal von Moltke may well take his ease, attend with methodical punctuality all sittings of the reichstag, play his rubber every evening, and devote so many tranquil weeks yearly to botanizing and agriculture on his estate at Kreisau. The system which has reduced the management of armies to the precision of a mechanical science was not constructed in a day; but now that long experience has shown how well it works its principal engineer can leave it without misgiving to be regulated, during his occasional absences, by the expert pupils whom he has trained. The marshal himself disclaims the idea that he is a necessary man. It is the very essence of his system, as he maintains, that it shall always bring out men of genius so long as any are to be found in Germany; but on this point foreigners, while recognizing all that is good in Prussian military administration, will not readily concede that men like the marshal are easy to replace.

The American Bishops and the Pope.

New York, Special Telegram, Dec. 19.—Rome Cable: Yesterday the American bishops were admitted collectively to an audience in the holy father's private apartments. This interview lasted nearly two hours and was most important. After expressing, in a general way, his satisfaction at the labors of the late congress, Pope Leo took up each of the thirteen points submitted to the congress and discussed them fully. The pope laid particular stress on the necessity of a higher education for the Catholic clergy and improvement of the relation of priests and bishops in America. He also expressed a deep interest in the success of the negro missions. Referring to the recent opening of the Vatican library archives, the pope said he was much gratified to see the savans of Europe, and even of America, availing themselves of the new facilities for study afforded them. His holiness them touched at some length on the question of the state of the Catholic church in the East, and prayed that he might live to see the reconciliation of the Greek and Latin churches.

General Notes.

Mrs. Marion Harland writes to the St. Louis Globe-Democrat in regard to her last story, "Judith." In so doing she breaks a rule adhered to for thirty years—that she would not reply to critics. She expresses regret that her favorite character in the story, a sprightly girl, should have married a rascal, to die wretchedly, but adds that the episode was true history.

The paucity of marriages in Jamaica, says Sir Anthony Musgrave in his recent official report on the condition of the island, is much to be deplored. In "intimate connection" with the observation the Governor notes the fact that the annual proportion of illegitimate births is more than 58 out of every 100 born.

Will Carleton's first poem, "Betsy and I Are Out," got into the waste-basket of the Toledo Blade, to which paper it was originally sent, but it was afterwards fished out and published one day when there happened to be a scarcity of "copy." All good things have to go into the waste-basket in order to achieve fame. All of Tennyson's poems are placed in the waste-basket and seasoned before publication.

Philadelphia has a Sunday Breakfast Association which gathers in the outcasts every Sunday morning, warms them up with a hearty breakfast, and then talks the gospel to them.

A Paris paper states with utmost serenity that a noble redskin who had been converted to Christianity was sent to be educated at Eton. Having been soundly birched he lay in wait for the master who had inflicted this distasteful punishment and scalped him, an incident which "created a great sensation about forty years ago." The story reaches its climax in the announcement that this young Indian, who had for a long time been lost sight of, has been identified as Sitting Bull.

Life, in its latest installment of its missionary articles on "American Aristocracy," describes an American gentleman who has very properly refused to loan his pictures to the horde of lower-class sympathizers, who wish to disgrace our chosen city with a statue of Liberty, which some misguided French persons, thinking we took some pride in our form of government, have offered us. What do we want with that bronze effigy? or with what it represents? or with the compliment and sympathy it expresses? Pah! If England, now, our dear old mother country, whom we aristocrats are dreadfully sorry our grandfathers thrashed—if England will only give us a colossal image of George III.—ah, here is something we could and would worship, gild and sing psalms to.

"An allegorical representation of the north wind!" exclaimed the gruff old man of practical ideas, as he looked at the artist's work in clay. "Oh, no," he continued, "a young woman with such a pretty and sensible face would never go out of doors in the winter with her neck so unprotected, her head uncovered and her back hair all loose and allow the north wind to blow her tresses all over her face. Now if you want an idea for an honest representation of the north wind take the head of an old chap like myself, with a big bald spot on his crown and his hair short and bristling. Have his coat collar turned up well under his ears, and bury his chin in it. Let his hat fly in the wind while his hair turns stiffly to the front his eyes, meanwhile filled with an anxious glare as he watches the fugacious headgear. Why, my friend, with such material as this you might work out a representation of the north wind so effectively that some people would wonder if the bald spot itself were not an effect of the north wind's vigor!"

Care of the Teeth.

1. "The best time for brushing the teeth is at night just before retiring. If at this time they are thoroughly cleansed, one brushing a day will suffice. 2. A medium sized brush with the bristles serrated or notched is best. It should not be too stiff nor too pliable. 3. The motion of the brush should not be horizontal, but semi-rotary, as the bristles will enter all the interstices of the teeth and remove whatever has accumulated there. There is a brush specially designed to cleanse the inside of the teeth and keep them free from tartar. 4. A little hand glass, such as dentists use, should form a part of every one's toilet. With this and a hand mirror she can know just what condition her teeth are in if she is careful in her examination. 5. It will be of comparatively little use to pay money to the dentist, if, between intervals of attention from him the mouth is neglected and unkempt. 6. A set of dirty teeth is as rarely found in the true lady or the true gentleman as a pair of dirty hands or dirty feet. [illegible] is well to have one's teeth ex[illegible] a dentist every six or tw[illegible] months. 8. Two ounces of prepared chalk, half an ounce of pulverized orris root and quarter of an ounce of cassia powder, mixed together, make a very good tooth powder. Pulverized charcoal is condemned as a dentifrice by all who know what is good for the teeth.

Washing Vegetables.

Housekeepers make a great mistake when they allow their vegetables to be washed at all until just ready to put on to cook. Many leave all kind of vegetables to stand, covered with cold water, for a long time after wash[illegible] so doing lose a large portion of the natural sweetness and flavor. Many grocers think they cannot sell their vegetables unless they wash them free from the earth that is on them when dug up, or they insist on the farmers washing them before they will buy. To make them look fresh and handsome they sacrifice a large portion of the best part of the root. If farmers washed their potatoes, turnips, carrots, etc., after digging them, before putting into the collar, they would be spoiled in a month. The earth about them is an absorbant and preservative of the less volatile elements of the root, which evaporate quickly after being washed. How often we hear city people speak of the excellent flavor of the vegetables they sometimes eat in country homes, and wonder why they cannot be cooked to taste as nice in the city. It is not because the farmer's [illegible] understands the art of cooking vegetables any better than the city dame, but because she first leaves her vegetables in the earth that covers them, until she needs to put them on to cook. Housekeepers only can cure this evil. The moment a grocer finds that he loses his time and labor when he washes his vegetables—just for the fancy looks of the thing—and that housekeepers are becoming sensible and will buy them only in their natural covering, then city folks can have as nice vegetables on their tables as the farmer is favored with—certainly they can do so after the season is too far advanced to gather vegetables fresh every day.

Since the advance in duties on crockery July 1, the American potters have advanced the prices on common white ware, which the masses use, the duty on which is 55 per cent. advalorem.

The Wheat Monopoly

Its Effect upon the Industries of the Northwest.

THE REMEDY.

During the past fall the wheat trade of the Northwest has been practically in the hands of the Millers' Association of Minneapolis, and the manner in which that Association has conducted its business has worked an immense amount of damage to the welfare of the Northwest that is not easy to calculate. In the start, a monopoly in any line of business is an evil, because it is in direct opposition to that spirit of freedom which is our pride and boast, which is the foundation of the American Government. It is an evil that affords dangerous opportunities for designing men to take advantage of the situation to exact an undue proportion of the profits of any transaction in which it is engaged, and, in this case, even if the Millers' Association is interested in the growth and development of the Northwest it places a terrible temptation in their power to exact the lion's share of the profits of wheat raising by giving them the power to pay just what they choose, because, being masters of the situation, there is no appeal from their decision. That this temptation has overpowered them this fall is very evident. In the outset the price of No. 1 hard has been at least ten cents per bushel lower in this market than the prices east, with a reasonable freight rate added would warrant; and it must be so in the very nature of the case as long as the wheat trade is controlled by the M. A., because they are obliged to depend upon an all rail transportation to the east, which will always make about that difference over the water route via Duluth. Complaints from prominent farmers, many of them supported by affidavits, show the fact that very much of our present crop has been taken as frosted wheat at from 30 to 60 cents per bushel—much of it wheat that was not damaged at all by frost, as well as wheat that may have been injured from 5 to 10 per cent.; complaints of false weights, of substituting Scotch Fife wheat for blue stem are well authenticated, and all combine to show that the Millers are at the bottom of the whole business and are making big money. The only elevator company that has attempted to reply to these wholesale charges is the Pillsbury & Hurlbert company, both members of which have stated that the P. & H. company gives the farmers better grades and prices than the Millers' Association in many cases allow for the same wheat, which, (if strictly true in every particular) is only another evidence of the steal, and shows that the elevators themselves are also sufferers by this system of false grading. But is it true in the case of the P. & H. Co.? Is not Mr. Pillsbury a member of the Millers' Association? And supposing he loses a little on grades in a few instances, does not his share of the proceeds of the profits obtained thereby from the M. A. more than compensate for the loss? The attempt to control the wheat market is too big a job for the Millers to handle, because, in the very nature of the case, location being not an unimportant factor, they cannot do it without distressing the farmers and damaging every other business interest in the country. Supposing, for arguments sake, we admit that the millers are not doing this thing simply to make money by it. They claim to work solely in the interest of the country upon which they depend for their best wheat and yet they oppose an open market by every means in their power. If they are working for the best interests of the country then we have to take the other horn of the dilemma and the country has to suffer just as bad as though they were stealing the wheat outright, for the present season has shown how entirely inadequate the grinding facilities of Minneapolis are, to say nothing about their banking and storage capacities. They have not sufficient mills to grind our wheat and yet they have more mills than power to run them at their fullest capacity. The farmers are obliged to sell their wheat as soon after threshing as possible. These facts, taken as a whole, cause a blockade, the blockade obliges the Millers' to do something to relieve [illegible]-train, and they lower the prices to [illegible] the wheat back until they can handle it. This is the reason the first wheat on the market in the fall sells the best. The millers are very anxious to get to work, so they offer up for the wheat in the neighborhood of what it is worth, as an inducement to keep them supplied. As soon as they get enough wheat to keep them busy down goes the price, and while they cannot do this openly, they do it as effectually by grading. The simple fact is the Millers' necessities make the grade—the quality of wheat seems to enter into the question, if at all, but slightly. This system is all wrong, entirely wrong, and whether you call it a steal [illegible] an effort to give the Minneapolis Millers' the control of the market, it is just as hard for the wheat-raiser. It is a system through which the producer is the loser every time, and there are enough sensible, intelligent men among the wheat raisers to understand these facts and to demand

THE REMEDY.

What shall it be? It must be an open market with all the competition the world can afford, with every available facility for transportation afforded that is within reach. We do not believe in doing anything rash, anything that in the future we shall have to be ashamed of. We ask only for justice, and that being denied us we must unite and work for it until it is obtained. We believe that the Manitoba road could provide a remedy if it will by allowing merchants and all who choose to build wheat houses to ship from, by allowing farmers to ship their own wheat to any market they wish, when they so prefer to do, and by giving equal terms to all who ship with no discrimination. We had a long talk with the railroad authorities last Monday and they seemed open to conviction and desirous to do all in their power to aid the country and to right existing wrongs. For that reason we would suggest that a committee of prominent men be appointed by our Chamber of Commerce to confer with Mr. Hill and Mr. Manvil upon the subject, to submit our case and request them to apply the remedy. If they are sincere and will aid us we can have an open market by next fall and no further expense be necessary at present. We need the elevators and we need the railroad, and we would not if we could legislate these necessary adjuncts out of existence. Another thing we should do is to provide for a farmers' elevator to be built in time for next fall's crop. This is a simple and practical remedy, and could easily be done. After we have done everything in our power to provide an open market for ourselves, we should build a railroad to Duluth, for it is an open secret that we cannot live and thrive in this country if the present state of affairs is to be continued. As much as the farmer seems powerless to help himself the fact remains, that the remedy is in his own hands. He can correct the evil if he will, by intelligent and concerted action. On Saturday next we have a meeting at Ericsson's Hall to consider the question and the hall should be filled with all who feel the effects of the monopoly and desire to apply the remedy.

WORK WITH NATURE.

Nature evidently intended this country for wheat raising and when she has had her way it is all right. She has provided the best wheat producing soil on earth, a climate that cannot be beat for maturing the golden No. 1 Hard. She evidently understood that in order for the sons of man to successfully compete in wheat raising, cheap transportation must be had to eastern markets, and behold the great chain of lakes, terminating in Lake Superior, upon the head of which, like a crown, lies the beautiful city of Duluth! Thus we see that Nature is not to blame for the monopoly that exists to-day. If man would consent to work with nature the plan would be all right and his success golden and complete. When he attempts to thwart her plans then he straightway comes to grief. She has done all she could but never intended to do it all and deliver your crops harvested, threshed, marketed, sold and money in the bank. Man must use the choicest seed, draw freely upon Nature's bountiful storehouse for his supplies, instead of buying everything he consumes upon his farm, and BUILD A RAILROAD TO DULUTH, to connect direct with Nature's own great and cheap highway to the east, the chain of lakes. Thinking men, men who deserve to succeed will read in the events of the past fall a most useful lesson and will profit by it.

Mr. C. S. Pillsbury seems very much exercised in his mind on the wheat business and says the charges brought are mere clap-trap and that the real object was to get another railroad into Grand Forks and to incense people against the Manitoba railroad company through the elevator companies. We can assure Mr. Pillsbury that he is entirely wrong in that assertion, for the fact of the matter is that the agitation of a railroad was first broached in the JOURNAL, in its issue of Dec. 13th, and was the outgrowth of the Millers' Monopoly. For a farming community to engage in building a railroad, in the minds of some, seems to be the height of folly and a wild-cat scheme, but, driven to desperation, as the farmers are to-day, they are ready and anxious to go into any scheme that promises relief from the grinding monopoly that is taking almost the entire profits of wheat raising and leaving them nothing but the consoling prospects of another hard year's work for the Millers' Association. Grand Forks, like every other sensible city, saw the pertinence of the plan and eagerly caught at it as the drowning man catches at a straw, and now Mr. Pillsbury accuses Grand Forks of originating and fostering the scheme to spite the Manitoba railroad. Such is not the fact by a long shot, but we can assure Mr. Pillsbury that as improbable as he may consider the scheme IT WILL BE ACCOMPLISHED and at no very distant day if the people in the Northwest are not granted what they ask for, an open wheat market, and the people will have the wheat monopoly to thank for having driven them to build it. Mr. Pillsbury says, "we naturally feel very indignant, considering that we have done more than any other firm in the world to develop the Red River country by spending $500,000 for building elevators, that we should be made the scape goats in being compelled to pull the chestnuts of Grand Forks out of the fire." If Mr. Pillsbury is endowed with the common sense that we give him credit for, he knows that the whole Northwest is up in arms on this wheat matter and his pretense that no one but Grand Forks is complaining is false on the face of it. Again, having invested so very much more than any other man "SIMPLY to build up the Red River country (?) if Mr. Pillsbury feels "justly indignant" because the people here object to the system of highway robbery which exists, what must he think the feelings of that farmer must be who has invested every dollar he had on earth to build up the Red River Valley, and a little home for himself, who has pledged his little property to enable him to raise his wheat and when he gets a good nice crop raised and marketed finds that the entire profits have been absorbed by an organized monopoly? There are single farmers in this Valley to-day who have done more to build up the country with their investments of from $500 to $10,000 and upwards than Mr. Pillsbury with his boasted $50,000 ever did or ever intended to do. The farmer invests for a home, to grow up with the country, to help to pay its taxes, bear its burdens and enjoy its fruits. Mr. Pillsbury invests his money here simply and solely as a business venture to make all of the money he can out of the country with the least expense put in. Again he says: "We have repeatedly challenged investigation as to our system of grading and offered to prove that we are LOSING THOUSANDS OF DOLLARS EVERY SEASON by being too liberal in our grades!" Well, now, that DOES seem a pity, on its FACE! And how very reasonable it seems that the P. & H. company will not only con[illegible] to remain in our market, buying at an annual loss of thousands of dollars, BUT ARE EVEN ARRANGING TO BUILD MORE ELEVATORS to enable them to LOSE MORE THOUSANDS ANNUALLY. We say that looks reasonable because Mr. Pillsbury says so, but if some darn fool should tell us that we should think he was crazy, for, from a business standpoint it would seem that if a man was playing a losing game and was as sure of it as Mr. Pillsbury is, that a plain business common sense would tell him to stop before he lost all of that $500,000 worth of elevators. Does Mr. Pillsbury mean to tell us that his company is submitting to the loss of thousands annually simply to benefit the Red River country, or does he infer that we are all a set of tarnal fools up here, who do not know better than to accept all that he tells us for cash without submitting to the light of reason. No, but he say that the fact that the C. A. Pillsbury company (the Millers' Association) buying a large proportion of the wheat saves the bacon of the P. & H. elevator company. So then the millers really have a way of organizing victory out of defeat and leave a margin for the elevator company. The inference remains that the margin left is much larger than could be obtained in an open market, otherwise why does the P. & H. company so strongly object to an open market? As to the loss of thousands of dollars every year we would like to know how it occurs. Are not the buyers who work for the elevator companies responsible for all the losses incurred in grading higher than the Millers' Inspector will allow? Does not this very fact cause a great deal of the trouble, the buyers not daring to give all they honestly consider the wheat worth for fear of dockage? Taken as a whole the arguments so far advanced by the Millers to show why the monopoly should be perpetuated are, if anything, only so many convincing reasons why it is for the best interests of the Northwest that the monopoly should be crushed out. In their efforts to control the wheat trade, to divert the wheat from its natural channel and force it to reach eastern markets by an all rail route in order to build up their own interests, the Millers have organized a system that is distressing to the whole Northwest, and that is doing more to drive out people, keep away immigration and depopulate the country than any other agency that could be brought to bear upon the Northwest, cholera, smallpox and grasshoppers not excepted. An open market is what we demand and this war are shall not cease until we obtain it, either through the channels we have or from others we shall procure, if we can obtain an open market by no other means.

A Big Elevator.

A meeting of the farmers and business men of the county is called on Saturday next, at Ericsson's Hall to discuss the wheat question and determine what is best to do about it. The project of building a large independent elevator has been discussed and is regarded favorably and will doubtless be one of the topics to be considered. That something must be done to change the existing order of things is perfectly plain and that an independent line of elevators would help there can be no doubt. When the Northwestern Elevator Co., entered the field it was thought that there would be some competition but appearances very plainly indicate that the Millers' Association have gobbled up the Northwestern and so it will be with every like institution that might arise except one composed of farmers and business men who are annually losing more than they could gain by a sell out. Such an institution would be of great practical benefit and it is something that could be done in time for next Fall's trade. Every stock holder could deliver his grain at his own elevator and draw a certain amount of money upon it and dispose of it when he chose. Every year, at some time, wheat will bring a dollar and upwards in this market and such an advance as the farmers could obtain on his crop would enable him to carry it until the proper time to sell. One elevator here, independent of the ring would help this country immensely and be worth thousands of dollars to this vicinity. Such an elevator would afford an opportunity for independent buyers to enter the field thus affording that competition which at present we lack. We should not even be obliged to bother ourselves about the matter of transportation as the buyers themselves would have that to attend to and they could probably make as favorable terms with the railroad as the millers now do. At any rate the law is supposed to govern that matter and a shipment of thousands of bushels is quite a different matter from the shipment of a few hundreds from one source. We are in favor of having the elevator built and will hold up both hands for it. If it is built it will in time result in an open market for other localities will follow suit if not this year they will as soon as they discover the practical benefits to be derived from the system. There should be a good attendance at the meeting and every man should come prepared to take at least one share at $100. Let us consider this matter at least and come so prepared to discuss it in all its bearings and then let us take hold and build it.

While the farmers are considering ways and means for relief from the burdens imposed upon them and are naturally laying much blame where it is justly due they should remember that the millers are not too blame for a yield of less than twenty bushels per acre, perhaps the blame for that lies nearer home. It has been demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt that in no country will wheat pay better. It has been shown that good cultivation means from 8 to 10 bushels more per acre—the better the cultivation the better the yield. Now while we are planning to build elevators and railroads and all those necessary means of relief it would be well for us to map out a campaign on the farm. Sow nothing but the very best of Scotch Fife wheat. Take great pains in preparing it. Sow about one-half the usual acreage and have that done well—no slip-shod work about that. Then raise more stock and manage it so that the farm will produce almost everything needed for provision. There is as much of a knack in economy of production as in a fancy price per bushel and almost always there is actually more saved. If a man is used to practicing economy he is the one whose bank account is not as much affected by this wheat business this fall as is the one who is disposed to be a little reckless in this as well as slovenly in his methods of cultivation. While we zealously defend all other weak points let us not forget to look to home a bit and see if everything is as near all right as we can make it.

THE PILLSBURY DISCUSSION.

The Pioneer Press has been interviewing the commission men of Minneapolis and gives the following result:

The recent published statement of Mr. C. A. Pillsbury, regarding the grading of wheat on the line of the Manitoba road, has brought the wheat men to the front again with their side of the question. A member of one of the largest commission firms in the city said yesterday that he had no doubt that the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator Company was as fair in its dealings with the farmers as any other firm in the Northwest; but he was satisfied that the line elevator system, controlled and managed by large corporations, was a positive injury to the farmers and detrimental to the best interests of the Northwest. He denied the justice of Mr. Pillsbury's statement that the markets along the line of the Manitoba road are free and open to independent buyers. He said that while it was true in theory it was nevertheless a fact that business could not be successfully carried on through the elevators of line companies by outside parties. In the first place, the elevator company does not guarantee grades, but compels shippers to take what it chooses to give them. As long as the company refuses to guarantee to shippers as good grades as they buy and place with them they are not public warehousemen in the sense the term implies. The elevator company ought to protect its customers on both sides, and do justice to the commission men, as well as the farmers. The Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator Company is managed in the interest of C. A. Pillsbury & Co., and about all the wheat that comes into their elevators is for the use of the latter.

Suppose, said the commission merchant, that independent buyers entered the field along the line of the Manitoba road and began buying through the elevators of the company, is it not reasonable to suppose that C. A. Pillsbury & Co., would get the best wheat that came in and the other fellows be compelled to take what they could get? It's human nature, and Pillsbury & Co., know when they have a good thing as well as anybody. This kind of competition would soon drive the outside buyer from the field, and he would be compelled to quit. Practically, the wheat business of the Northwest is in the hands of a few large corporations and it cannot be denied.

He did not think Pillsbury & Hulbert were any worse than others, but the whole system of the railroads allowing a company to have a monopoly of the grain buying along its lines was a bad one, and could not result in anything but injury to the farmer. What the farmer really needed was competition—a market that was actually open and free, and privileges granted to anybody who wants to buy wheat.

Under the present plan it is almost impossible for independent or outside parties to engage in buying wheat along the different roads in the Northwest. The Manitoba company make it a rule, and it is asserted that contracts are made with Pillsbury & Hulbert under which other parties will not be allowed to build grain houses on the line of the road unless they are of the same capacity as those already built, the minimum to be 30,000 bushels. This rule makes the present monopoly permanent, or at least sure, for a number of years, as there is not now sufficient wheat business to require double the elevator capacity of the road, and investors could not afford to erect buildings as large as those of the Pillsbury & Hulbert company and run them profitably. The road would get just as much wheat if merchants, local buyers and others are allowed to erect small elevators and buy all the wheat they could. Competition was the only remedy for the farmers, and until they got a free and open market they would have ample cause for complaint.

To illustrate the advantage of competition, the commission man stated that where two or more buyers were in the field, even in a friendly way, the farmer was sure to gain by their efforts to get all the grain they could, and he was certain to get as good grades as it was possible to give, in order to get his wheat. Because, if the offer of the first buyer did not meet his views, he could go to another; and, rather than allow him to go away, with the reasonable prospect of losing his wheat the buyer would be pretty certain to stretch a point and give him even a better grade than he was entitled to. If he allowed him to go away his neighbors would be certain to get the benefit of his experience, and the buyer who refused to give him as good get elsewhere, would not be likely to have a chance to bid on his neighbor's grain. This fact alone proves that competion is a good thing, even if prices were agreed upon between buyers, as the grades would be all that could be given, in order to secure as much of the wheat as possible. The present system of grading was an evil that could not be denied. He thought Pillsbury & Hulbert's grades are as liberal as any other line, but they were irregular and not to be relied upon. His own experience proved that. He had purchased only a few cars on this line, but in those dealings he became satisfied that outside buyers had no show. The company's grades could not be relied upon. If commission men bought the company's tickets they were obliged to take Minneapolis inspection; but if the millers' association bought the wheat it took it at its own inspection, regardless of Minneapolis grades.

OTHER OPINIONS.

Another gentleman, at the head of one of the strongest commission houses in the city, and who is one of the most reliable and conservative business men in the chamber of commerce, talked very freely in regard to Mr. Pillsbury's letter. He regarded it as a very weak defense of the charges that have been made against his company in connection with the Manitoba road. He said:

The charges of monopoly in the buying of grain are too well founded to be so easily put aside, and the statements of Mr. Pillsbury that his company were giving the farmers better grades than they could really afford out of pure sympathy for the down-trodden and monopoly-ridden farmer was susceptible of doubt. In the first place the fact that Pillsbury & Hulbert were the only buyers on the Manitoba road virtually placed the farmers in their power, and without remedy. They were compelled to take such grades and prices as the local buyer chose to give them, and the fact that the buyer was under bonds to his employers made him careful to take the safe side in every case. If the farmer is dissatisfied with the grade on his wheat what remedy has he? He cannot market his grain any place else, but is compelled to take what he can get and submit to the inspection of the only buyer in the market. The advantages of honest competition over such a system need not be pointed out. They can easily be seen. But as long as the Manitoba road refuses to allow competitors to enter the market in its territory without putting up elevators of the same capacity as those belonging to Pillsbury & Hulbert, it is giving them a monopoly of the business. Perhaps a company will be formed that will be able to invest an equal amount of capital and enter the field as legitimate competitors. I hope to see this done. Competition would not only benefit the commission men as well.

He did not think Pillsbury & Hulbert were open to charges any more than any other elevator line men; but the whole system of monopoly was dangerous, and ought not to be fostered or encouraged. He had always opposed the millers' association on that ground. The combination of capital and the powerful influence which the association was able to exert to further its own interests were dangerous weapons against the growth and prosperity of the Northwest. People did not realize fully the benefits which would accrue to Minneapolis from an open and free market all over the Northwest as well as here. He was not opposed to the association in a modified form, and would not object to it if it kept its own buyers in the country and got all the wheat it could; but he wanted to see the extinction of the rule which prevented members of the association from buying a bushel of wheat on the chamber of commerce in this city freely and without espionage by the association itself.

The monopoly of the elevator business by these large line companies is an evil second only to that of the millers' association. What the farmers of the Northwest want is honest competition. When they have this at their home markets and in the market here, the matter of grades and dockage and like causes of complaint will very soon right themselves and the prices paid for wheat will be all it is worth.

A RIVAL LINE CONTEMPLATED.

A gentleman connected with the Northwestern Grain Dealers' Association informed a Pioneer Press reporter yesterday, in the course of a conversation on the above subject, that his company are now building a large elevator at Duluth and would probably build a complete line of elevators on the Manitoba road next year. The association has received the heartiest encouragement from the Manitoba officials, who say they are anxious to have competition in their territory. If the association conclude to enter the field against Pillsbury & Hulbert it will erect elevators of the same capacity as those now located along the line, and go in prepared to get their share of the business. It is the intention to make its elevators public warehouses to the fullest extent, and outside parties will receive equal facilities for handling grain through their houses. If this is done and the business properly conducted, it will go very far toward solving the difficulties under which the farmers of that section are now groaning.

Mr. C. A. Pillsbury of the P. & H. Elevator Co., and the Minneapolis Millers Association is very much exercised in his mind just now and is indulging in protestations of the innocence of the elevator company, claiming that they two are sufferers. He fails to say how much the millers' association is making in this wheat operation and while he is lavish in protestations in every other direction he fails utterly to signify his willingness to join with others in an open competition for wheat in an open market. He fails also to enlighten the farmers upon the only topic on which they feel especially interest i. e. in knowing by what right the Millers Association assume to control our wheat market and to dictate terms to us. Mr. Pillsbury can write till he is ninety-nine years old, one letter every day and it will not change the facts in the case nor satisfy this country that no wrong is committed, no evils exist. If he is half as anxious as he says he is let him consent to the only remedy that will avail for us—an open market! He don't seem half as fast to grant justice as to talk about it. He seems to have the idea that the Minneapolis Millers have a sort of an inherited right to the wheat in this country and pay for it as their necessities dictate and expresses surprise that any one should have the temerity to question that right. He claims that Minneapolis to-day pays as much for wheat as does Duluth and for that reason jumps at the conclusion that she does it all through the season. His conclusions are at fault or else the experience of the few in this country who shipped to Duluth before the close of navigation is greatly at fault for they did obtain far better prices and fairer grades than the millers would give. Mr. P. says he courts an investigation and we can assure him that the Northwest is dying for the lack of investigation and relief. He need not think that we fear the light of day shed upon these doubtful transactions; that is just what we want and we only want all men to know and we are willing and anxious to have these bottom facts brought out and abide the result. We don't believe that Mr. P. is sincere in that assertion and we don't believe he would allow the whole workings of that system to be made public. If he would we very much mistake the man and the system. Mind you we do not mean a superficial examination of the business but a thorough probing for bottom facts. The farmers are willing and ready to show up if the Millers will be as ready we should arrive at some facts that would astonish the natives or we greatly miss our guess. If they are so VERY anxious to investigate why don't they let up on some of that chin music and INVESTIGATE!

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, DEC. 27

County News.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Mr. Fred Buse has been quite ill for some days, but is improving.

R. H. Abraham left on Thursday for Minneapolis where he will remain a few weeks.

W. A. Schreiter and wife were among the number who visited Crookston last week.

Mr. Elton and family have gone from Black River to the thirteen townships where Elton has a fine claim.

We acknowledge a pleasant call on Thursday last, from Messrs. Chiniquy and Lachapelle of Crookston. The latter who is deputy sheriff of this county, is one of the genuine "old settlers," dating back to the days when railroads as yet, had not reached the "Queen city.' He noted some changes in this vicinity since he first struck the "Red."

Within the past week we have seen horses that had been driven hard tied up while their owners went into saloons and stores, and no attempt made at covering them with robes or blankets, although in most of cases not for lack of them. It is useless appealing to the feeling of such men, they evidently have none, but we would suggest to them that their pockets, (where their little souls evidently dwell,) will be directly affected by such inhuman treatment of helpless brutes, and that a little more care in protecting their teams will be a good investment.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Business is rushing this week, and our merchants are correspondingly happy.

Perhaps you are not aware of the fact that St. Hilaire is steadily growing while many neighboring towns are standing still.

Mr. P. A. Dufour, one of Crookston's best lawyers, has been spending a few days in the vicinity, looking after his real estate interests here.

Last week Mr. H. Watts fell on some ice and severely sprained his ankle, since which time he has been confined to his house.

Mr. O. Waldon, of Watson, Minnesota, is visiting his daughter, Mrs. J. M. Hanson. He is so well pleased with our town, that he has decided to remove here in the spring.

Quite a large number of logs are being hauled into the saw mill since the sleighing commenced and Will Sorsohel is making the saw go faster than ever in order to keep up.

Building operations do not seem to cease. Mr. J. Branum, finding his present Hotel to small for his rapidly increasing custom, has decided to build a large addition to it, and will commence the erection at once. The new structure will be two stories in hight. Mr. Branum says he is bound to keep pace with the growth of St. Hilaire, and if the new building is not large enough, he will put on another addition in the spring.

A Good Farmer.

According to a writer in London Farm and Home, a good farmer must combine the judgment of many different vocations; he must be a good financier—on a small scale, to be sure, but still a good one; also a good manager of labor; must combine the judgement of the grazier; the butcher; the gardener, and the merchant; he must also have that judgement about the conditions of the land and crops for which there is no written rule, and which careful observation only gives; and in addition to all this he must have that quality for which there is no name, but which generally adapts means to ends, and accomplishes things—which knows when to finish one thing at a time (which is generally best), and when to leave that thing and do something which needs doing more—the faculty which keeps his whole business together. This judgment is the farmer's first and greatest need; it is the high court which must pass upon all that is brought before it. The only man whose success is hopeless, and who will never acquire it, is he who thinks he knows it all in the beginning.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

GRADING AND FREIGHT RATES.

Discussed in Temperate and Intelligent Fashion—Another Dakota Farmer's View of the Wheat and Transportation Question—A Demand for Free Trade and Equal Rights in Shipment.

Pioneer Press, Dec. 26th.

MILBANK, D. T., Dec. 23.

To the Editor:

In the Weekly Pioneer Press of Dec. 13 I notice the letter of your correspondent from Groton, D. T., as well as your editorial on the same subject. You criticise the writer for the bad temper of his article, but I strongly suspect that, were you in his place—and in that of thousands of farmers in Minnesota and Dakota—you would feel differently. The question he discusses has become a grave one—in fact, the question of the day—and with your permission I wish to say a few words on the subject; but before doing so, as facts aid us in the search of truth, I will speak of the condition in my own immediate vicinity. The best judges, taking the assessor's returns for the acres sown to wheat in this county and the known yield per acre, place the amount of grain in this county (Grant) available for market after retaining enough for bread and seed at 1,000,000 bushels. The market, as things now are, for the farmers means the nearest elevator on the Hastings & Dakota railroad. He has reason to expect to receive for his product the market price for wheat in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Milwaukee or Chicago, less the freight charges to those points, and a fair margin to the elevator man, for handling. The schedule rate from here to Minneapolis is about 12 cents per bushel. (What the millers' association pays is only known to the higher intelligences and two or three railroad men). The difference on the average between the price paid here and the market quotations in Minneapolis for the past three months has been 24 cents per bushel. The most serious cause of complaint, however, has been that wheat has been graded, not by any known rule, but simply at the caprice of the elevator men. To illustrate, wheat weighing sixty-two pounds to the measured bushel, free from foul seed, bright and in perfect order, graded No. 3—simply because there was a very little smut in it. Wheat bought at the elevator in the spring as "hard" when taken to market after harvest graded "soft." Wheat taken from the same bin, in all respects alike, would grade from No. 3 up to No. 1; and in one case, and probably more, a man after trying repeatedly to get a grade of No. 1 for a sample of beautiful wheat, and being unable to get over No. 3, employed his neighbor to haul for him the same lot, who had no difficulty in getting grades of No. 2 and 1. Quite a large per cent raised here is soft wheat, and the buyers have taken advantage of this fact to lower in buying nearly all the grain bought here at least one grade. Samples sent to Minneapolis and Milwaukee, which would only grade No. 3 in this market, invariably grade there No. 1. A very low and conservative estimate of the amount the farmers have secured for their grain—taking into account the the wide margin between price here and in the market cities, as well as grading—will make the loss to the farmer 10 cents on each bushel. It is doubtless much more than this; but, at this low estimate, the farmers of this country have received $100,000 less than they ought to have done, after paying schedule rates for freight, commission, and a business profit to the men who handled the grain. This one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars means a good deal to the settlers in a new country like this. If they had it, it would mean more land improved, better buildings, more home comforts, debts paid to merchants and manufacturers, and last but not least, a feeling of comfort and encouragement.

Now the pertinent question is, how comes it that this condition of affairs exists in a country where it is supposed there is a government which protects the weak against the strong, and where equal and exact justice is the [illegible] [illegible] The Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway company will only furnish cars to ship wheat for elevator men. Every effort has been made; men have been sent to interview the officers of the road, letters and telegrams without number; but the only answer (when any answer was given) was: "If you want to ship wheat you must do it through the elevators." Merchants having grain in warehouses other than elevators—farmers—all have exhausted effort, but the elevator men and miller's association seems to be masters of the situation. There was an entire willingness to pay the regular rates of freight; to load the cars in the shortest possible time; no special favors were asked. Men simply wanted the privilege of sending their produce to such markets as their best interests demanded. This is a simple and moderate statement of the condition of affairs in this locality, and if report can be relied on, we are no worse off than most other places in the Northwest. It has been said here that the officers having charge of this company's roads west of the Mississippi river would have corrected the abuse, but were overruled in Milwaukee. How much truth there is in the rumor, I cannot say. That this condition of affairs must be changed, and that speedily, no thinking man can deny. It would be impossible for any combination to exist, having it in its power to take from the community the profit for a year's hard work, like the combination of the millers' association and elevator ring, unless sustained by the railroad company. Without this the natural law of business would remedy the evil. I am truly glad that you have decided to discuss the question, and with most of your article I, in common with a large majority of your readers, agree. I think, however, you are in error when you state, that the reason why restraining legislation has not been had before is because farmers and business men have been so unreasonable in their demands. The real reason is not difficult to find or far to seek. I think I know the sentiment of the Northwest on this question, if twenty years of intimate acquaintance is of value; and I have never yet found the man, unless smarting under the effects of immediate injury, who in his calmer moments manifested any desire to do anything to impair the value of railway property. Men as a rule comprehend and give full credit for the blessings which railroads confer upon the country, except when they are used as an engine of oppression. It is not a safe rule to mistake the feelings of a few men smarting from oppression for the sentiment of the whole community. There have been doubtless many attempts at foolish and unwise legislation; but a law which should require and compel the railway companies to treat every shipper in all respects alike would satisfy ninety out of every hundred men in the Northwestern States. Freights in some cases are excessive, it is true; but it is not this which is complained of, but discrimination between shippers. At least three-fourths of the evils of our transportation system may be traced to this cause alone.

When in addition to the evils which naturally grow out of large aggregations of capital centralized in a community of as large and diversified interests as ours, is added the building up through them of other corporations to tax the industries of the people, thoughtful men may well ask where is to be the end? But the simple enactment of a law to compel the railroads to treat all its patrons alike will not be worth the paper the bill is written on, unless means are provided for its enforcement.

To make a law and leave it to the men who do business with the road to see it observed, would be simply child's play. There is no principle which has been oftener decided by our courts than that railroads are common carriers, and must therefore treat all alike; and yet it is powerless. True, a shipper who has been refused cars, or who has had to pay 50 per cent more than his neighbor for like service, may (if he can find an attorney competent to conduct his suit not retained by the company), and if he has money enough to follow the case through the many months and years to the court of last resort, recover damages, but every man knows this is simply impracticable. My own opinion on this subject is that it is wise to ignore all these questions of "long and short hauls," "cast-iron rates," and the numberless comparatively unimportant matters involved, and only require that all shippers should be treated alike. But to make even this regulation effective the state must provide for its enforcement. The penalty for the violation of law must be such as to command respect, and its enforcement must be both swift and speedy. This may be done by a commission or otherwise; but in whatever way it is done, the whole power of the state must see that its enactments are respected, and that, too, without delay. To an outsider it would seem that the law of busines governing railway traffic, as managed, was altogether different from all other kinds. The manager of railways has not yet come to the front who can comprehend that the interests of the men of the farm, forest, mine, mill and shop are identical with that of the owners of railway property. That when one interest suffers, both suffer; that when the producing interest is prosperous, the other prospers in like porportion.

The proof of this statement may be found on all, or nearly all, of the lines of road in Minnesota and Dakota where the interests of the millers and the elevator men are fostered, and that of the men who really make the business ignored. The business public do not desire an aggressive warfare against the railroads; much less do they ask especial favors. They simply ask that every man should be put on the same footing in his business relations. They wish to send their products to such markets as their interests require, and that they shall be treated in all things in the spirit of business courtesy, which no reasonable man ought to deny them. The theory that [illegible] rates [illegible] $10,000 [illegible] sell [illegible] only [illegible] costs [illegible] here to Minneapolis than it does one for the Millers' association, is not so clear; or that it costs more to haul a car of lumber from Minneapolis here for me, where the shipper loads and the consignee unloads, than it does for John Smith, who ships ten cars, I think it would puzzle most men to see into. Of course, all expect to pay more for small parcels of merchandise than for larger quantities, but the rule does not apply to car-lots. Any other plan than that of letting all stand in the same business relation is productive of wrong, and has no other effect than to make the rich richer and the poor poorer, as well as to promote discord and bad feeling.

A question has arisen in the minds of many as to why it is that the public press—with its wide and extended influence—with his power to mould public opinion and its manifest duty to rebuke wrong—is so silent on this grave question. Now and then a local paper, influenced by the indignation of its patrons, has something to say; but as a whole the press, and especially the city press, is silent. Is it because the prosperity and well being of the country is of no value to the cities?

Good Men Make Good Horses.

Minneapolis Tribune.

We saw a farmer the other day with a fine looking team passing our residence. One of the horses in his team had a familiar look. Halting the farmer, we said, on looking closely at his horses, "why, your off horse is the counterpart of neighbor —'s balky horse—the one he had so much trouble with a year or two ago." "Why," said the farmer, "this is the same animal. After a few days I never had any trouble with him." "How did you break the balky creature?" We inquired. "By kindness" retorted the farmer; "The same way that I have broke lots of other horses in my lifetime that were considered unsafe, either in the saddle or harness." Well, well, this proves what someone said, that a horse is never vicious or intractable without a direct cause. If a horse is restive or timorous, you may be sure that these faults arise from defects in his education. He has been treated either awkwardly or brutally. Commence the education of a horse at his birth; accustom him to the presence, voice and sight of man; speak and act gently; caress him, and do not startle him; all chastisement or cruelty confuses the animal and makes him wild. They are good men who make good horses. We do not now remember of ever seeing an uncertain, unsafe, balky horse belonging to a man of this character. They make the horse good.

We ask every Republican in the United States to assist in extending the circulation of the Blade, especially among those of the Republican party who believe as we do in the necessity of Pulverizing the Rum Power. THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

The smiling countenance of S. E. Chapin was seen upon our streets on on New Years Day.

If you wish to get a first-class saw mill, apply to Steenerson Brothers. They have them in stock. Call and see.

Boss Millard is going to put new shelves into the Arcade and Sam Rosenthal is to occupy it as a clothing house.

New Years Day passed off pleasantly though quietly with no very stirring event to distinguish the day from others.

The Chronicle has wisely decided to re-enter the weekly field. Working for fame or glory may be nice and pretty but it don't pay a very large dividend on the investment.

Steenerson Bros. sold a steam saw mill that is going into the thirteen townships. They seem to have all that kind of trade; suppose they have; the goods that are in demand, they have the boss.

Alderman Fortier did the nice thing on New Years Day at Fortier's place. A long table on the east side of the room fairly groaned under its load of good things and the rapidity with which they disappeared showed how much they were appreciated.

Mr. H. Brin intends to put in a large and handsome stock of Gent's Clothing next spring. Meanwhile he is disposing of his stock of goods at prices to beat all. He says he must and will dispose of his present stock soon if he has to give the goods away and he is almost doing that now.

The JOURNAL was made happy on New Years Day by the receipt of a box of "Seely's Best" cigars with the compliments of the season from Charlie Seely. If there are any better cigars in this city we are waiting for the "feller what" owns 'em to trot out a box. Until then Charlie's cigars take the cake.

Services in the Baptist Chapel by the Pastor, Rev. H. L. House every Sunday Morning at 11 o'clock; Evening at 7 o'clock Sunday School at 12:15 immediately after morning service. Those who belong to our Sunday school will please notice this change in the hour of meeting.

If we need any arguments to convince us of the high handed outrages perpetrated in the wheat business this fall we have only to take notice of the state of trade at present. We can conceive of no better argument for the necessity for a change of venue especially when we consider the fact that under the present regime we can never be better off but will continue to grow worse every year.

Charlie Seely had a fine New Year's present in the shape of a tub of butter and a tub of piccalilly, the present of a lady friend in Minneapolis, Mrs. Randall Patton. Charlie feels very proud of his present as it is an evidence of the skill of the lady who is over 80 years of age and who made both articles. Charlie says the presents are the most valued of any he received or could receive.

Charlie Seely outdid himself on his New Year's spread. Roast meats of all kinds, in fact everything you would expect to see and many things you would not, greeted his friends, while Charlie bobbed up serenely, smiling to see the boys enjoy themselves. Charlie has a big body but he has to have to accommodate the big heart he has. Happy New year to Charlie and many happy returns of the day.

On Saturday last Ed. Schrader and George Warninger had some words over a bill of Ed's and in the evening Ed came in when the discussion was renewed and a quarrel resulted, during which Ed was knocked down with a chair and severely hurt. Patient inquiry fails to reveal the exact status of the case which will doubtless be brought out on the trial. Mr. Warninger has given bonds to answer to the charge. Mr. Schrader is said to be in a precarious condition.

The fire bell rang out clear and sharp about 8 o'clock on Monday night which rumpus was caused by a burning chimney in the dwelling house just south of Paul Bataglia's furniture shop. No damage was done except to give the chimney a good cleaning.

Fred Almy is enjoying a furlough of a few days with friends in Polk Co. Fred is one of the C. P. striking engineers and reports that the boys are all at work again and that the difficulties are soon to be satisfactorily adjusted Fred is stationed at Moose Jaw, N. W. T.

J. S. Erickson and L. Absolonson have purchased a saw rig of Steenerson Bros., and on Wednesday started for the thirteen towns with it where they intend to engage in the manufacture of pine lumber. The timber consists of down timber on the White Earth Reservation which the Indians have the right to cut and use. They say they can cut from 7,000 to 8,000 feet a day.

Joe Hoch departed for Wabasha on Tuesday morning where he will remain some time. We learn that he intends to go into the Dept. Sheriff business down there. Joe is a good boy and will make friends anywhere. He took along an elegant meerschaum pipe which Mr. R. Burkhardt sends to his father, Henry Burkhardt as a New Year's gift. The pipe was a beauty and a very valuable one.

A man, giving the name of W. R. Leonard has been causing some little stir. As near as we can learn he first appeared at the Box hotel and said that he was suffering from rheumatism. After being here awhile he one day approached Pete Misgen and told Pete that he was a detective, employed by the Canadian Government to find sundry bad counterfeiters who were building counterfeit $10—against the peace and dignity of her Majesty's Government, and asking Pete to lend a hand. Pete did not catch on but referred the man to Marshal Dan McDonald who took him to the Mayor. The man claimed to be working under instructions from the chief of police of Winnipeg, Mr. Murray, and said that Mr. Murray would be down on the train on a certain day. The police were instructed to render all necessary assistance and on the day that Murray should appear Pete Misgen accompanied the man to the train and went with him through the train but no Murry appeared and upon questioning the conductor it was found that no such man had been on the train. They both then left, Pete agreeing to meet "the detective" next morning at the Box house. Upon going to meet him Pete learned that the bird had flown and a day or so later a telegram from Beltrami was received at the hotel asking about the said "detective" if he was all he pretended or n. g. Shortly afterward Mr. Massey, proprietor of the hotel at Beltrami came to the city and upon information given by him, Mr. Doane, landlord of the Box hotel had a warrant got out for the detective, and Sheriff Zwiskey deputized Mr. Massey to take the warrant, arrest the man and bring him in. A day or so afterward Pete Misgen received a telephone message from Red Lake Falls requesting him to come out to W. Godfrey's at Maple Lake saying that the detective was there, had a clue and wanted assistance. Pete went out as requested and upon arrival learned that the detective had gone to a neighbors a few miles distant and had left word for Pete to await his arrival. At Pete's [illegible] invited Mr. Godfrey to accompany him and show him the way and soon was on track. Arriving at the house where the detective was he was not surprised to find that he was not there but had gone on to Fertile. Taking a shorter cut Pete arrived at the residence of Damon Dodge, on the Sandhill, and there learned that his man had not arrived. A son of Mr. Dodge's had gone to Fertile and was momentarily expected and arrived soon with the information that the man was at Fertile and was going to stop over night. As Pete's team was pretty tired Mr. Dodge took his own team and the party started for Fertile. Enroute, Mr. Massey was overtaken on the same errand and all proceeded together. As Mr. M. had the warrant Pete told him to make the arrest which he did and the prisoner (alias the detective) was taken to Beltrami; brought thence by rail to Crookston and hailed before Judge Lewis, who said "$37 or thirty days." The "detective" chose the latter and now languishes in the Bastile.

Those chaps up thar in Kittson County know a good thing when they see it. Bro. J. W. Wallace, of the Enterprise, has given them one of the cleanest and best local newspapers on the line and Hallock has been much benefitted thereby, and to show a just appreciation of Bro. W's labors in their behalf they have gone at it and secured his appointment as clerk of the court of Kittson Co., which document was handed him on Christmas Day. Bro. Wallace has done good work for Kittson County and we are glad to see that he is so evidently appreciated by those for whom he is so faithfully working.

Farmers' Railroad Meeting.

A meeting of the farmers of the town of Fairfax is hereby called to convene at my residence on Wednesday, Jan. 9th, 1884, at 2 o'clock p. m. to consider the question of bonding the town in aid of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad. A full attendance is desired.

JOHN AMUNDSON, Com.

Farmers' Railroad Meeting.

A meeting of the farmers of the town of Crookston is hereby called to convene at the residence of Mr. Peter Heydt, on Monday, Jan. 7th, 1884, at 2 o'clock p. m. to consider the question of bonding the town in aid of the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad.

Mr. A. P. Bond and Mr. G. H. Palmer have formed a partnership in the law and real estate business and have opened an office on Robert Street, one door west of Fortier's place where they are prepared to do a land office business. The boys make a good team, are honest and capable and we trust will do well as they deserve.

The farmers' committee appointed at the farmers' meeting on Saturday last are requested to meet to organize on Saturday January 12th immediately following the farmers' meeting on that day. [illegible]

[illegible], Chairman.

A High-handed Proceeding.

A number of the members of the Congregational church society got their heads together and deliberately—with malice aforethought—and we fear on Sunday, too, planned a bit of a New Year's raid on the domains of their organist, Mrs. Sara L. Hopkins. On the eve of New Years day, Mr. and Mrs Hopkins went over to a neighbor's to spend the evening and this opportunity the plotters were not slow to avail themselves of—they trooped in, gun, knapsack and commissary stores, in fact camped right down, about fifty in number in the partially deserted mansion of Hopkins, and sent the little daughter, who had been left to mind the house and baby to inform mama and papa that a neighbor and his wife had come in from the country to spend the evening. When they arrived they thought so too—and wondered if there were any more "neighbors" left on the prairie. After an evening of jollity where the best of good cheer prevailed and every body enjoyed themselves to the fullest the company broke up and returned to their homes, leaving behind as a token of their regard for the faithful services of their organist, Mrs. Sara L. Hopkins, an elegant dinner caster, a pickle castor and one dozen silver knives and forks.

As many of the teachers have signified a desire for the formation of a teachers association, I would request that all those interested in the matter will meet at the high school room in Crookston, on Saturday, January 12, at 9:30. a m. Let us have a full turn out and our meetings will be of great benefit.

Yours truly,

S. A. FARNSWORTH.

MARRIED.

BIVINS—CASSIDY.—At the residence of the bride's parents, at Reed's Landing, Wabasha Co., Minn., Dec. 24th, by the Rev. Mr. Haslett, EDWIN H. BIVENS, of Stephen, Minn., to Miss JENNIE CASSIDY.

The generous supply of wedding cake accompanying the above notice convinces us that what we predicted when Ed left us has actually befallen him. Poor boy, poor boy, he has our hearty sympathy and heartfelt condolence. May their pathway through life be profusely strewn by the roses of health and prosperity.

HOLMES—JOHNSTON.—In Detroit, at the residence of the bride's parents, on Thursday, Dec. [illegible]th, 1883, by the Rev. [illegible] F. Herrick, Mr. OLIVER M. HOLMES, of the Red Lake Falls Gazette, to Miss VIRGINIA JOHNSTON, daughter of Col. Geo. H. Johnston, of Detroit.

Well, well, we little thought when we grasped the hand of O. M. a few days since that, alas, so soon he would be called upon to meet the dread ordeal. Well, so it goes, the young, the beautiful, none are exempt, and all that is left is to extend the usual condolences which we now proceed to do in good shape. STATE NEWS CONDENSED.

Minnesota State Educational Association.

A large number of school superintendents, principals and teachers from all parts of Minnesota assembled in Minneapolis last week to attend the eight annual convention of the Minnesota Educational Association. At the opening of the meetings Prof. B. F. Knerr of Minneapolis presided. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. Sample, Bishop Foss, and Hon. T. W. Bicknell of Boston, president of the National Educational association. Superintendent B. F Wright of St. Paul gave an account of the meeting of the National Educational association at Saratoga Springs last July. Prof. Cook, superintendent of schools of Olmsted county, read a paper upon the evil effects of the vicious literature published and circulated among the children, such as the Day's Doings. Prof. Niles of Olmsted county moved that a committee of three be appointed to act as a medium of communication between teachers desiring situations and principals and school officers desiring teachers. Adopted, and the committee was made up of Sanford Niles of Rochester, D. L. Kiehle of Minneapolis and C. W. Smith of Minneapolis.

Miss Maria L. Sanford, of the State University, read a paper on moral training, making an elaborate and eloquent plea for the inclusion of methods of the training of something beside the memory and the intellectual faculties, educating the feeling, the disposition, the will, cultivating habits of neatness and orde as well as entertaining the higher realm of morals. State superintendent Kiehle followed Miss Sanford, speaking to the same point.

There was a long debate on Herbert Spencer's education, pro and con, resulting in the adoption of a resolution, "That this convention indorse the action of the institute conductors in recommending Herbert Spencer's Education, and that the matter of omitting any injurious doctrine contained in the work may safely be left to the judgment of the teachers using the same."

President Allen moved, as the sense of the teachers, that some measures should be taken to establish a professional standard for teachers under the authority of law. The necessity for this is the fact that graduates of normal schools have no higher standing in fact than a teacher in the third grade of the common schools. On motion, a committee of three was appointed to aid the state superintendent in securing such recognition as is above contemplated from the state legislature.

The president announced President Allen, St. Cloud; Profs. Wright of Meeker and Tanner of Owatonna, as the committee under the resolution of President Allen.

Superintendent Wright of Meeker offered a resolution providing that the future meetings of the teachers' association shall hereafter be held at the state capitol at St. Paul.

Prof. Gray of St. Cloud expressed his opinion that it would be better for the association to meet at St. Paul, and the president decided St. Paul as the next place of meeting under the constitution.

Prof. Wright of St. Paul, from the committee on nomination of officers, submitted the following list:

President—T. J. Gray, St. Cloud.
Vice President—Mrs. W. Jenness.
Secretary—Mrs. E. R. Shepard,
Correspondent secretary—B. M. Reynolds.
Treasurer—W. H. Sanders.

One of the most fashionable weddings ever witnessed in Northfield took place, Christmas day, when J A. Lawrence, of the Archer house, was married to Miss Leotti Bailey of that city. The couple were escorted to the church by the members of Orient Encampment I. O. O. F. in full uniform, the groom being a member of the order.

At the time she shot herself, her husband had just gone out in the morning to milk the cows. She also seemed to attach some blame to her parents. She was probably somewhat mentally deranged. She was thirty-three years of age, had been married four years and was a native of Ohio.

Put Upon Their Feet.

What was the the matter of Mr. Joseph G. Goodridge, of 151 Huntington street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Well, he had dyspepsia, and couldn't sleep nights.

How did he get relief?

He didn't get any relief for nearly two years, though he tried, he says, "nearly a hundred different medicines."

What did he finally resort to?

Burdock Blood Bitters, and says he in a letter to the proprietors of this remedy: "You may use my name in any style of advertisement you choose. I want you to have the benefit of my opinion, and that is that Burdock Blood Bitters are an excellent tonic for the stomach and a fine blood purifier as well. They cured me."

What did Chas. L. Ainsworth, 41 Vance Block, Indianapolis, Ind., say?

He said, "My mother has been using Burdock Blood Bitters as a liver remedy and finds them very efficacious."

Who is A. Burns?

He is a blacksmith, living about three miles east of Cobourg, Ont.

What does he have to offer?

Ten cents is what he says he wouldn't have given for his chance of living before he used Burdock Blood Bitters. He had dyspepsia for fifteen years, and was cured by three bottles of this very excellent preparation.

You see these eruptions on my face. Do you suppose Burdock Blood Bitters would remove them?

We guarantee they will. There isn't a better medicine in the world for diseases of the blood. Ask Rev. Wm. Stout, of Wiarton, County Grey, Ont., afflicted with a great, indolent sore, which seventeen different physicians treated without success, what he thinks of Burdock Blood Bitters—a medicine that saved him from the grave. They certainly have not an equal in their specialities. By every druggist.

A MYSTERY OF THE SEA.

The Fate Which Overtook the "City of Boston."—Captain Murray's Ideas and Experiences.

A few years ago, the City of Boston sailed from harbor, crowded with an expectant throng of passengers bound for a foreign shore.

She never entered port.

The mystery of her untimely end grows deeper as the years increase and the Atlantic voyager, when the fierce winds howl around and danger is imminent on every hand shudders as the name and mysterious fate of that magnificent vessel are alluded to.

Our reporter, on a recent visit to New York, took lunch with Captain George Siddons Murray, on board the Alaska, of the Guion line. Captain Murray is a man of stalwart build, well-knit frame and cheery, genial disposition. He has been a constant voyager for a quarter of a century, over half of that time having been in the trans-Atlantic service. In the course of the conversation over the well-spread table, the mystery of the City of Boston was alluded to.

"Yes," remarked the captain, "I shall never forget the last night we saw that ill-fated vessel. I was chief officer of the City of Antwerp. On the day we sighted the City of Boston a furious southeast hurricane set in. Both vessels labored hard. The sea seemed determined to sweep away every vestige of life. When day ended the gale did not abate, and everything was lashed for a night of unusual fury. Our good ship was turned to the south to avoid the possibility of icebergs. The City of Boston, however, undoubtedly went to the north. Her boats, life-preservers and rafts were all securely lashed; and when she went down, everything went with her, never to re-appear until the sea gives up its dead."

"What, in your opinion, Captain, was the cause of the loss of the City of Boston?"

"The City of Limerick, in almost precisely the same latitude, a few days later, found the sea full of floating ice; and I have no doubt the City of Boston collided with the ice, and sunk immediately.

Captain Murray has been in command of the Alaska ever since she was put in commission and feels justly proud of his noble ship. She carries thousands of passengers every year, and has greatly popularized the Williams & Guion line. Remarking upon the bronzed and healthy appearance of the captain, the reporter said that sea life did not seem to be a very great physical trial.

No! But a person's appearance is not always a trustworthy indication of his physical condition. For seven years I have been in many respects very much out of sorts with myself. At certain times I was so lame that it was difficult for me to move around. I could scarcely straighten up. I did not know what the trouble was, and though I performed all my duties regularly and satisfactorily, yet I felt that I might some day be overtaken with some serious prostrating disorder. These troubles increased. I felt dull and then, again, shooting pains through my arms and limbs. Possibly the next day I would feel flushed and unaccountably uneasy and the day following chilly and despondent. This continued until last December, when I was prostrated soon after leaving Queenstown, and for the remainder of the voyage was a helpless, pitiful sufferer. In January last, a friend who made that voyage with me, wrote me a letter urging me to try a new course of treatment. I gladly accepted his counsel, and for the last seven months have given thorough and business-like attention to the recovery of my natural health; and to-day, I have the proud satisfaction of saying to you that the lame back, the strange feeling, the sciatic rheumatism which have so long pursued me, have entirely disappeared through the blood purifying influence of Warner's Safe Rheumatic Cure which entirely eradicated all rheumatic poison from my system. Indeed, to me, it seems that it has worked wonders, and I therefore most cordially commend it."

"And you have no trouble now in exposing yourself to the winds of the Atlantic?"

"Not the least. I am as sound as a bullet and I feel specially thankful over the fact because I believe rheumatic and kidney disease is in the blood of my family. I was dreadfully shocked on my last arrival in Liverpool to learn that my brother, who is a wealthy China tea merchant, had suddenly died of Bright's disease of the kidneys, and consider myself extremely fortunate in having taken my trouble in time and before any more serious effects were possible."

The conversation drifted to other topics, and as the writer watched the face before him, so strong in all its outlines and yet so genial, and thought of the innumerable exposures and hardships to which its owner had been exposed, he instinctively wished all who are suffering from the terrible rheumatic troubles now so common might know of Captain Murray's experience and the means by which he had been restored. Pain is a common thing in this world, but far too many endure it when they might just as well avoid it. It is a false philosophy which teaches us to endure when we can just as readily avoid. So thought the hearty captain of the Alaska, so thinks the writer and so should all others think who desire happiness and a long life.

Talk About People.

The late cook for Prince Bismarck has been interviewed and says that the chancellor's favorite breakfast is bacon and eggs. He dislikes white or fresh-baked bread of any kind and takes hard brown toast and black coffee for breakfast, after having had a "nip" of brandy and seltzer when he first gets up. He is very fond of coffee and will take four or five cups when he has been working late the night before, while at midnight he invariably drinks a cup of tea. The ex-cook declares that when anything goes wrong in the Reichstag "he storms about the house like a fury."

An English bride, Miss Jessel, has had a wonderful wedding cake. On the top, done in sugar, was a representation of the meeting of Rebekah and Abraham's servant at the well, the grouping modeled after Vernet's celebrated picture. The cake was four feet high and weighed 227 pounds. The cover or top lifted off so that the cake could be cut.

But Mr. Carlisle found no peace at his hotel. Langtry's agent headed him off first. "Have you decided what night you and Mrs. Carlisle will accept the box at Langtry's performance?" asked the agent. "No. Haven't thought of it. Forgot all about it. If you want Mrs. Carlisle to go you'll have to speak to her. I shall forget all about it." "What, forget Langtry, Mr. Speaker?" asked a member. "Who is he, anyway?" asked the perplexed statesman. "I have no time to see or hear these actors."—Washington dispatch.

It is all very well to have a sweetheart who is spiritually minded, says the Indianapolis Journal, but the girl who looks into futurity and sees death reaching after her lover is not likely to fill a popular demand. Miss Lemon, of Millersburg, O., was one of this sort. One week ago she was stricken with paralysis. Before her death she said farewell to her intended husband, informing him at the same time that he would follow her in a very short time. The young man, who was healthy and robust, and whose appetite seemed not to have been affected by his loss, ate a hearty breakfast on Sunday morning, and was soon after stricken with paralysis, precisely as Miss Lemon had been, dying in two hours.

The proposition of Washington C. De Pauw, of New Albany, to give $240,000 to Asbury University, at Greencastle, Indiana, in return for $180,000 additional endowment and the change of name to De Pauw University, has at last been accepted and the millionaire glass manufacturer's name will now supersede that of the early Methodist divine and bishop. This new candidate for fame has also, with the consent of his wife and children, signed an agreement to give the institution forty-five per cent. of the remainder of his estate at his death. It is estimated that the endowment will aggregate about a million and a half of dollars.

William M. Evart's dress is thus described by an Albany reporter, who watched him while he was arguing a case in one of the courts: "He was dressed in what might be called the style of the antique renaissance. His trousers were continental in cut and modest in color; a black vest was cut low enough to display an expanse of immaculate linen, and was ornamented by a plain gold watch chain, with horseshoe pendant. His neckwear displayed a dislike of new style. Over an old-fashioned stock of black silk, reaching well up toward the chin, rolled a starchless collar, completing a picture suggesting the portrait of some statesman of half a century ago. There was a quaint dignity about the famous jurist which, withal, formed a pleasant study for those of the rising generation present."

Doctors and Patients.

In one of our large provincial towns a middle-aged individual, suffering from indigestion and various other ailments, having been advised to consult the leading physician of the locality, was ushered into the latter's private room. When he had detailed the symptoms of his malady, loss of appetite, sleepless nights, and so forth. "Ah," said the doctor, "I see how it is you require plenty of air and exercise, but we will soon bring you round. Nothing so bad for the digestion as sedentary habits, desk-work, and that sort of thing. You must manage to walk as much and as often as your business will allow. By the bye, what is your business?" "Traveling peddler for the last five-and-twenty years," replied the patient. Some few months ago one of our medical celebrities was walking down Bruton street one afternoon with a friend, when they perceived coming toward them a strikingly handsome woman. D. Z. immediately seized his companion's arm, and without saying a word crossed rapidly over to the opposite side of the street. "What is that for?" inquired the other. "Why, the fact is," stammered out Hyppocrates, "I don't particularly wish to meet that lady. I attended her husband last year—a very bad case indeed—and—" "I understand," interrupted his friend, "he died under your care." "Worse than that," replied the physician, "a great deal worse. I cured him, and from what I know of her, she is not likely to forgive or forget it."—All the Year Round.

INTRODUCING WILD BILLS.

How it is Done and What Becomes of Them.

From the Chicago Journal.

The ceremony of introducing a bill in its proper order is a very simple one, and one very easily accomplished. Monday of each week is "bill day," and, after the morning hour, the states are called in their order "for the introduction of bills." Then any member may rise in place as his state is called and, holding up his package of bills, yell, "Mr. Speaker." Perhaps there may be a half half dozen from his state yelling at the same, but, if he has stronger lungs than the other fellows, he may get the first recognition from the speaker. If so, the speaker looking toward him, says: "The gentleman from Illinois," or whatever state the recognized member may hail from. If there are more than one from that state on the floor at once, as is usually the case, the speaker indicates the one recognized, by adding "on the right of the chair," "or on the left," or "in front," as the case may be. If it is necessary to be still more explicit, he adds to the customary recognition the name of the member. When the gentleman desiring to offer a bill or bills has thus secured a recognition, he holds up his package containing the bills, and says "I desire to offer a bill for reference, Mr. Speaker." Then a page boy, or, perhaps two or three of them bound madly toward the member, seize the package and rush with it to the reading clerk, whose stand is just in front of the speakers desk. Then the speaker says: "The gentleman from Illinois introduces the following bill." Then the clerk reads in stentorean tones the title of the bill, for, as the hubbub on bill day (and at any other time for that matter,) is like that of a political convention, it is only by very loud reading that he can be heard at all. After the bill is read by its title the speaker refers to its proper committee. It then goes through the hands of the proper clerks, is endorsed and registered and finally sent to the room of the committee to which it is assigned, and, being properly endorsed and registered is duly pigeon-holed, and permitted to await the action of the committee. In half the cases the committee does not act on the bill. Perhaps it discusses it, perhaps not even so much as that.

Some Phases of Life in Hayti.

It is a great pity that a country of such untold wealth as Hayti should be constantly in a state of revolution, but nothing else can be expected. The country can amply support its population without the necessity of work and industry, hence the indolence of the people and their objection to allow trade, which brings its foreign element to settle in the country, which they want to have themselves. The laws of the country sufficiently show the people's antipathy to the white people. No foreigner can possess land or own property unless he should intermarry with a woman of the country.

It was supposed that, on reaching power, Solomon, with his civilized ideas, would make some change in a statute so arbitrary and unjust to foreigners, but he is at present unwilling to displease the lower classes, who are his main supporters; hence his silence on the subject.

It is really to be wondered at that a country situated so near to a large, civilized and prosperous continent should be so backward in everything appertaining to civilization as this. The inhabitants of cities, as a matter of course, glean some of the civilization of the few foreigners and natives who have received European education, but the most dreadful ignorance exists among the populations of the mountain villages. It was only seven years ago that twelve men and women were shot for offering up their children as burned offerings in Vondooism. This religion, which is known and practiced in the states by blacks, in no way presents the repulsive appearance that a savage, ignorant and blood thirsty race display their fearful devotion. Although the offerings of children at burnt sacrifices are supposed only to exist in the past, yet there are many of the peasants who, when spoken to on the subject, turn away with a shudder.

With all these terrible contentions of politics and religion, yet a man can travel the intire length and breadth of the country without encountering a single robber. Highway robbery is unknown, and the superstitious peasants, supposing the traveler to be under the protection of their gods, not only fear to harm him, but actually offer to him the courtesies and hospitalities of their homes, refusing in any such cases to accept money or presents in return.—[Corresponce Philadelphia Press.

The Penalties of Excess.

It is asserted by alienists that insanity is on the increase, and they account for this by saying that people generally overdo everything. Nervousness and nervous diseases are continually increasing, and from similar causes. In fact, the greatest hindrance to human longevity to-day is the tendency toward excess in everything. It is not only in business that over-work is common. It is quite possible to hurt even the strongest constitutions by excessive indulgence in mere pleasure. A short time ago, what purported to be an account of the daily life of a young girl in "society" was published, and it was by no means wholly caricatured. High-pressure living and acting and thinking cannot be kept up indefinitely. Nature always resents over-drafts upon her account current, and sooner or later she returns them indorsed "no effects," through the medium of a collapse or a stroke of paralysis. The strong, too, are more apt than the constitutionally weak to run into excesses, because they fancy that they cannot overdraw their account. But modern life is full of pitfalls for the unwary, and unfortunately the common example seems to justify and certainly encourages the prevailing tendency to excess. The alienists say that we smoke too much. Some of the doctors contend, indeed, that tobacco is an active poison, to be classed, as it is by the temperance folk, with alcohol. But the more conservative assert that great constitutional harm is done by the intemperate use of "the weed" during the period of adolescence, and few can doubt this who notes the pasty-faced, rickety lads addicted to the cigarette of the period. The safe middle path is no longer popular. All must reach forward at the top of their speed. And the consequence is that our insane asylums and our cemeteries are becoming fuller and fuller, while thousands of homes are either broken up altogether or made wretched by the abuse of health and the obstinate violation of natural law.

ONE OF THE BEST PHYSICIANS TESTIFIES.

I have been using Swift's Specific in my practice for quite a long time, and I regard it the best combination as a blood purifier and tonic. It is entirely vegetable, being composed of the extracts of roots which grow in this section of Georgia. I am familiar with its history from the time the formula was obtained from the Indians. It is a certain and safe remedy for all kinds of blood poison and skin humor, and there has never been a failure to cure. I have cured blood taint in THE THIRD GENERATION with it, after I had most signally failed by the most approved methods of treatment with mercury and iodide of potassium. FRED A. TOOMER, M. MISS RIVINGTON.

"It is for such women I would possess neither chivalry nor mercy. A woman who counts the effect of every intonation, every smile, every glance—who trades upon her beauty and man's weakness as the passing amusement of an hour—whose self power is her sole duty."

It was a harsh criticism, and Horace Winter's voice unconsciously hardened as he uttered it. It was to his fiancee that he spoke. Perhaps to another he would have been more guarded; but there was no softening in his handsome face, as he looked down from his splendid height to the slight, girlish figure, who laid one little hand pleadingly on his arm.

"You are unjust to Maude, Horace," she said. "It is not like your usual judgment of women. Did I not know you better, I should say you almost feared the power you so ruthlessly condemn."

"No, darling. I despise Maude Rivington, as a woman unworthy her womanhood—a woman who seems to me, in the strange, incongruous friendship between you, like some gorgeous poison-plant beside a pure white rose, in its half-blossomed loveliness. I wish—"

But Horace Winters' wish was never uttered. At that instant, the portiere dividing the library from the music-room was brushed aside. In the former apartment, where the two had stood together, the gathering twilight had already half-hidden the room in shadow, but the soul-darkness failed to hide the marvelous and transcendent beauty of the third comer upon the scene. How long had she stood there? how much had she heard?

Instantly, Miss Mathers, her hostess, divined—nothing. It would have been impossible otherwise, she reasoned, for her to come forward with that radiant smile, and, outstretching her hands to the blaze from the logs in the fireplace, utter some commonplace about the dreary November promise of an early winter.

But the man thought—nay, knew differently. The woman had spoken, I have said, a commonplace; that is, so the words written would seem. In reality, nothing that fell from the rich, crimson, smiling lips ever appeared so. Something of her own rare, piquant charm invested all she said or did; but in this moment, even while the low, sweet, musical voice broke the silence, the violet eyes upraised themselves an instant into her censor's face, not with a challenge, but pathetic with a mute appeal—such a look, perhaps, as overspread Cæsar's face when he looked up and knew that his friend had slain him.

In all his life no man had ever accused Horace Winters of being a coward; but in this moment he felt himself such. Had he really been ungenerous, and toward a woman? Could he have been mistaken in the estimate he had formed, when he had deemed Miss Rivington a beautiful, soulless statue, using her arts but in the destruction of men?

An instant he let the doubt enter like a sword thrust in his soul; then he sternly barred it out. Had he forgotten that she was an actress, that for the moment he was ready to let her acting deceive him like the rest?

"You are cold, dear? You have been out?" questioned her friend, glancing at the tiny fur-bordered cap resting on her small, exquisitely-poised head.

"Yes I have been walking. I went to my room to write some letters, but the paper looked so cold and unresponsive, that I felt quite sure nothing I could put upon it would make it less so. I believe, too—" this with a rippling laugh—"that I grow weary of myself and my own thoughts, and so thought to get away from both. I fear, however, my success could scarcely be construed into a triumph."

"It is too bad you are tired. To-night, you know, is the Howards' ball—the first of the season. It will not do for its belles to be weary."

An instant's shadow crossed the lovely face, then she stretched out her hand and let it barely touch Helen Mather's fair young cheek ere it fell again.

"You are too good to me, dear; but I promise my weariness will not be apparent at the ball. Who could imagine Maude Rivington weary when music and dancing were on the tapis? Besides, ma chere, I am quite recovered already. I have had a tonic administered since I left my room, and one that can hardly fail to take effect."

Before Helen could ask the nature of the stimulant, the butler announced dinner, and the conversation dropped.

"Ask Maude to dance, Horace. She is my guest, dear. It is the merest courtesy. Do it for my sake."

These were the hurried words Miss Mathers found a moment to whisper in her lover's ear, a half hour after they had entered Mrs. Howard's brilliantly illuminated drawing rooms.

The man glanced across them now to a distant corner, where stood the woman surrounded by a little crowd of men. Conscious always of Maude Rivington's beauty, to-night it dazzled him. She was dressed all in white, unrelieved by any spot of color, save a bright crimson stain upon one cheek, and the rich ruby of her lips. The violet eyes had darkened almost to blackness; but though she had laughed at her weariness as a jest, something still suggested it in the shadows about the sweeping lashes, and the drooping corners of the exquisite mouth.

With a shrug of his handsome shoulders Horace crossed to her side. The little group made way for him to make one of themselves.

"May I claim one waltz, Miss Rivington, or is your card already full?"

She glanced up, hesitated an instant, then handed him her card. Every space was filled save one—a waltz half way down the programme. How happened that one coveted dance to be undisposed of?

"I am fortunate," he said, a ring of quiet and unconscious sarcasm in his voice; and hastily scribbling his name he handed back the now completed card, bowed and retired.

"Thank you, dear!" whispered Helen, when he had found his way back to her.

But somehow the words jarred on his ear. Now and then he knew that Helen Mathers did not quite fill his heart as another might have filled it. It was the case of a man adored rather than a man adoring.

He had known her for many years. He knew her to be pure, and sweet, and womanly. The betrayal of her heart's secret, unconsciously to herself, caused his generosity to respond and ask her to become his wife.

The question had well-nigh stunned her. She had sometimes felt she was living some dream whose awakening must soon follow. In her sight her lover was unlike all other men, and stood a prince among them. His strength, his manhood, were in her eyes infinite—only equaled by his intense and unselfish tenderness.

The evening was half at an end, when, from its hidden recess, the band clashed forth its harmonious summons to the waltz against which his name was inscribed upon Miss Rivington's card. Before its introduction was finished he was prompt to claim his promise.

She spoke no word as she arose and permitted him to encircle the slender waist with his arm. Together they floated down the room. She danced most exquisitely. He scarcely felt her weight as she leaned upon him.

He looked down upon the perfect beauty of her face, and recognized its wonderful, potent charm. A subtle perfume of violets was wafted to his senses; his heart beat heavily.

Merciful heaven! had he, too, gone mad, that this woman could move him thus?

As yet neither had broken the silence, but, with the waltz half ended, she spoke:

"It is warm here," she said. "Will you take me into the hall?"

Instantly he complied. She knew the house well, and led the way into an ante-room, for the moment deserted. There she turned and faced him.

"I want to ask you," she said, "why you will not be my friend?"

He knew then that his suspicion of the afternoon had been correct—that she had heard all that he had said of her. Once again the sense of almost cowardice smote him. Then he grew hard.

"You have many victims," he answered. "Do you sigh still for another on your list?"

"You forget that Helen is my friend, and I am hers," she said, reproachfully.

The long lashes swept her cheeks, but he fancied that for an instant ere they had fallen he had detected the glimmer of unshed tears. The sight stirred his inmost pulses. He caught her bare white arm in his grasp.

"Do not tempt me," he murmured, in low, intense tones. "If I loved you, I would kill you did your glance but rest on others as I have seen it rest."

A moment before he would have thought himself incapable, not only of such a speech, but the motives to induce it; but something within him, which through all the thirty years of his existence had lain dormant, suddenly wakened into life.

The possibility of joy akin to ecstasy revealed itself as twin to the possibility of pain so great that beside it all other suffering dwindled into insignificance—nay, more, into nothingness.

He had seen this woman daily for three weeks, during which time she had been the guest of his betrothed. He had seen her wonderful power and its ruthless exercise.

Could it be possible that all this time he, too, had been under its sway, or was it the momentary spell of the serpent which allured and held him?

"If we had known each other earlier," she murmured, "things might have been different. Now, now, it is only the might-have-been."

"What do you mean?" he said, hoarsely, carried away by an impulse stronger than his strength. "Can it be you might have cared for me? Why, then are all men your lawful game?"

"You have been cold and cruel," she replied.

"How else could I hide my wounds?"

"Answer—you love me? Maude! my love, my queen! answer me."

He no longer sought the truth from himself or her—he loved for the first and only time in his life. No false idea of honor swayed him. With his heart another's, it would be dishonorable, indeed, to marry any woman, least of all one who trusted him as fully as the girl who even at this moment dreamed her sweet dreams for the future. To destroy them was dishonor—yet, but to go on deceiving her, now that he knew the truth, greater dishonor still.

"You love me? Answer me!" he said.

He saw the graceful figure tremble as with a sudden chill. The bright spot on her cheek had faded; even her lips had paled.

Slowly, and slowly the veiled lids unclosed, and the exquisite violet eyes were revealed to him. In them he read her answer.

For one rapturous moment he clasped her in his embrace—it seemed to him his very soul opened to receive her—a moment only, then she drew herself away.

"You have forgotten—Helen!" she said; and for the first time her voice lost its sweetness in its strained and harsh intensity.

"I have forgotten nothing," he replied. "Helen shall know all ere she sleeps to-night. She is too generous not to forgive."

"No, no, she must not know to-night!" she pleaded. "Wait until the morrow—wait until I have seen you once again. You promise me?"

"What could you ask I would not promise?"

"Take me to the carriage. Tell Helen I was suddenly taken ill, and would not call her, knowing she would insist on accompanying me. Tell her I am tired."

What Might Have Been.

Ex-Congressman Erastus Wells in N. Y. Express.

It was in the fall of '75, I believe, that I met Blaine one morning at Willard's hotel, in Washington. He was hoping at that time for a nomination by the republican convention for the presidency. "I don't know, Jim," said I laughingly, "if it will be a good thing for you or the country to be nominated." "I'd make it very hot for you fellows if I were," said he, with a chuckle. "And if you happened to be elected you would make it very hot for us afterwards," added I, for we all know Blaine to be what we call south a "fire-eater." He became very solemn all at once as he answered: "Erastus, if I should be elected to the office of president of this country, which I regard as the loftiest position in the world, I should be a president for the whole people. I should recognize no sectional differences; I should bind myself to no pledges, but should do the best I could for the whole country." "Nonsense," rejoined I, jokingly, "you would run with the machine like the rest of them" "I would not!" he said, with emphasis, "and if I ever have the chance to show you, you'll see." He didn't get the chance then, but he's got it now; and Garfield, who, of his own accord, will be glad to conciliate Conkling, and would never in the world have dared to nominate Robertson, has now been forced to the front and will stay there. As long as Blaine is at the helm this administration is going to have its own way.

A Discomfited Dude.

The Boston Journal, with an ill-concealed chuckle, tells how a dude was discomfited:

"Yes," said a prominent member of our noble army of local dudes, as he conversed with a number of friends upon the ever-absorbing subject of the fair sex, "one great trouble about women is that they are apt to misunderstand the significence of the attentions that are paid to them," and then he went on to explain his position. In brief, his grounds for arriving at this conclusion were as follows: During one of the rainy days in the early part of the week, on coming into town on a visit to the suburbs, he found the rain falling in torrents as he emerged from the depot, and also saw on the steps a young and attractive lady, who looked with an air of great vexation at the descending floods Perceiving here, with that swift intuition which is our friend's most noticeable characteristic, an opportunity to make an agreeable acquaintance, he spread with a flourish his hammered silver-handled silk umbrella, and with his most engaging smile sidled up to the lady and said: "You have no umbrella; permit me to offer mine." "Oh thanks, very much," responded the fair, grasping the proffered implement of protection; "you are so good. And here is your name and address on the handle. I will send it to you by my husband early in the morning," and she sailed away, leaving the generous youth staring blankly after her and speechless with surprise. And he was obliged to go into the depot and borrow an umbrella of the ticket agent to get home withal, and a disreputable, dingy, cottony affair it was, and looked as though Noah might have carried it during the early days of that wet spell which made him historically famous. And the next day his own umbrella was brought back by the husband aforesaid, a man six feet high and remarkably muscular, who smiled in an exasperated way as he tendered his wife's thanks for the temporary accommodation.

The Hon. Wayne McVeagh is said to have $100,000 worth of thoroughbred cattle on his farm at Brockfield.

There are 17,061 more government pensioners than at this time last year.

FIELD AND FARM.

Farm Miscellany.

An Ohio correspondent of The Pittsburg Stockman mentions "an attempt in some parts of the West" to establish fairs, agricultural not merely in name. The grangers are starting the independent movement in behalf of the farmers themselves. There is pressing need of this reform, since, as he truly says, "nearly all our annual fairs, State and County, have degenerated into horse-racing and other exciting exhibitions to attract the idle and the vicious, and to make money for special interests in the towns near which they are held."

I find more profit in a cow that comes in fresh in the fall than from those that are fresh in the spring. Not only does butter bring a better price, but I think the cows give more milk in the year under this management, for just when they come to the time when they would naturally begin to shrink largely in their milk they go on fresh pasture and increase the flow, while a cow that is fresh in the spring begins to shrink just at the season of failing pasture and the transition from green to dry feed, and great falling off in milk is unavoidable.

The heaves is an affection of the lungs and occasionally of the heart as well, through the lungs. It is a nervous disorder, which affects one of the principal nerves of the body, the pneumogastric, which controls the digestive and breathing organs, so that the disorder may have its seat in the stomach or in the lungs, or both, or in the nervous system. It is accompanied by violent action of the lungs, which causes a heaving of the flanks for a short time and by spasms, or when the horse is worked hard or run quickly. The usual remedy is to relieve the stomach by feeding lightly with highly nutritious food to give no dry feed, and to keep the system open by proper medicine. Also, to relieve all pressure on the throat or neck; provide ample ventilation in the stable, and keep the air pure; and, further, to give water only in small quantities and never soon after feeding.

For the Cook.

"Any housekeeper can prove the honesty of her grocer, or his butter, by melting it. Pure butter melted produces a pure, limpid, golden oil, and it retains the butter flavor. Melt oleomargarine, and the oil smells like tallow and looks like tallow, and a scum rises to the surface. Butterine is a mixture of dairy butter and fats. Melt that and the butter oil will rise to the top. Pour this off, and you will find the fats at the bottom, whitish in color and giving off a disagreeable smell."

Various are the dishes that can be made of the oyster; here is one not very well known: Take a small loaf of bread; cut off a slice from the top; then, with a spoon, remove the inside of the loaf, leaving the crust nearly, but not quite, an inch thick; make a very rich oyster stew; pour a little into the loaf to moisten it; then put in a layer of oysters; then of bread crumbs well salted and peppered; put the top crust on, and set it in the oven in a dripping pan; wet the crust with the yolk of an egg, or with sweet milk in which you have put a little sugar; serve hot, and let remain in the oven for from fifteen to twenty-five minutes.

Stocking Bag.—Cut off a piece of calico or cretonne thirteen inches long. Cut out three pieces of pasteboard seven and a half inches long and six inches wide and round them at one end. Cover these pieces with the calico, and sew two of them together at the straight ends. On the third, full a pocket with an elastic across the straight end. Gather the two ends of the calico and sew them on to the covered pasteboard. The straight ends of the pasteboards and the selvage ends of the calico will form the top of the bag. Sew two large eyes or rings on each pasteboard and two more on each selvage edge, put a tape through it and tie it, sew some flannel leaves between the double pasteboards, and the bag is done. Yarns, etc., are to be kept in the pocket. Made of bright cretonne this little device is very pretty and is certainly very useful.

Celery Culture.

Mr. Stearns gave an account of celery culture at Kalamazoo, where 500 acres were raised this year and five to eight tons shipped daily, from each of the two express offices. The celery is packed in boxes made especially for the purpose. The producers receive twenty cents a dozen bunches. The seed is sown in a bed prepared for the purpose; the plants not transplanted until they are put in the trenches. A layer of manure is spread in the bottom of the trench before the plants are set; the plants are set six inches apart in the row. For the early crop the seed is sown in hotbed and transplanted about the first of May In Kalamazoo but little is stored by the producers; that which is stored is packed in pits covered with low sheds. For a few dozens, one of the best ways of storing is to put in a box in the cellar on the bottom of which is a puddle of earth and water to cover the roots. Professor Tracy said marsh celery does not keep so well as that raised on upland. In keeping, it must not get wet as that causes rot.

The Steam Plough.

In foreign countries, England especially the steam plough has been used to some extent, and a few wealthy agriculturists of the United States have one time or another experimented in the direction. To the number must be added Mr. Hiram Walker, of Walkerville, Mich., who lately stationed a portable engine on each of the two sides of a 45 acre field and with this power hauled back and forth through the rich, mellow soil, free from stones and stumps, two gangs of four ploughs attached to a wire cable and working alternately, turning furrows 5 to 8 inches deep as may be required. The capacity of this imported machine is thought to be 16 to 18 acres per day, under the favorable conditions above indicated; and five men are required to run it—two engineers, two to follow the ploughs and one to supply the fuel and water. Whether the system is practicable on the large level farms of the west is a question for time.

Dairy Discussion.

Dr. Joseph Tefft, in his president's address at the annual Illinois Dairymen's Convention, in De Kalb, reminded devotees of the worst of weeds that no fine butter can be made in a room where smoking is indulged, as the milk and cream will absorb more or less of the fumes and flavor of tobacco. He strongly condemned barnyard wells as pools of pollution and disease, injuring the health of cows and the wholesomeness of dairy products. He reported good results from feeding bonemeal and sowing it on his land as a preventative of abortion. But others said they had suffered from this epidemic among their the result was essentially the same as that reported by the doctor. Mr. Gurlee said his cows that aborted proved very unprofitable, and some nearly worthless. He advised getting rid of them as soon as possible. But Mr. Alvord would not dispose of a valuable cow, even if she aborted twice. In his experience, the cows came around all right, and dropped a healthy calf the third time.—The exhibition of a lot of fancy cheese, of American make (Limburger, Pineapple, Edam, Young America, Gruyere, Neufchatel, fromage de brie, d'Irigny and American Cream) suggested the idea of possible profit from more varied manufacture.

Self Support Among Women.

In the Helping Hand department of the Philadelphia Weekly Press I find the following editorial; So many of us have little girls under our charge it is worth while to read these words of wisdom. We all know of sudden downfalls of fortune and the consequent bewilderment of the girls. There would not be half so many erring sisters if all were taught to be independent. So, even if we are prosperous, let us teach our girls it is honorable to labor and delightful to spend the money earned by their own hands:

Three cases have recently been developed in a single social circle in one of our large cities, of women, bred in comfort and even luxury, who have been, with their children, reduced to a condition of want and unspeakable distress by the acquisition on the part of the husband and father of grossly intemperate habits. Housewifely skill, diligence in patching and darning, and in the nameless little economies which prudent women know how to use, avail these sorrowing women little. They need to know how to make money. They could make time to practice some art of industry at home, or, if need be, they could employ some faithful woman to stay with their children for some hours each day while they toiled abroad, if they only knew how to do this. Teach your daughters, and with a view of doing work which shall possess commercial value, to master some trade or profession.

In a land where banks never fail; where husbands and fathers do not die and leave families penniless; where intemperance never comes to blunt men's love and sense of honor; where fire and pestilence and earthquake never cut off the bread-winners—there women may be bred simply to look pretty and talk nonsense. But in a country like ours they must learn to work.

The chief requisite for the success of woman in any department is good health. Make your daughter, then, to follow strictly hygienic rules. Forbid her to eat between meals; require her to stay in bed at least one-third of the 24 hours; throw off her corsets and throw them into the rag bag; make all her clothing to depend from her shoulders; turn her out doors as much as you can; teach her some special branch thoroughly, and you will find that you have a merry, happy, healthy girl, who is light in the household, a stay in the time of trouble and who, above all, can, if need be, earn her own living and provide for others.

From Manson's admirable papers on "Work for Women," recently published in the Christian Union, we extract the following list of respectable and suitable occupations for women:

"Industrial designing," "short hand writing," "telegraphy," "feather curling," "photography," "professional nursing," "proof reading," "printing," "book binding," "lecturing," "working in brass or metals," "reading or singing in public," "canvassing for books and papers," "dress-making," "millinery," "market gardening," "poultry raising," "bee keeping," "housekeeping," "bookkeeping and cashier work," "buttonhole making," "floriculture," "authorship," "teaching," "type writing."

Dancing Toilets.

Among the new fabrics appropriate for dancing toilets are shown some exquisitely tinted India and China crapes in all the latest high-art shades some plain and some embroidered. More beautiful even than these are the Persian silk gauzes, with deep gardiniere borderings in vivid hues. Unlike the mulls and muslins lately alluded to, these embroidered gossamers are to be made up over tinted satins and surahs the costume consisting of demi-trained slip, perfectly plain, except a double rose or shell touching around the bottom, about eight inches deep. Above this the long, full-embroidered overdress of the diaphanous fabric is arranged a la Grecque, with a high Camargo bodice of the same over a low-necked, short-sleeved underbodice of the silk. When it is possible the floral garniture worn with the dress corresponds with the flowers wrought in the embroidery. These charming fancies are not designated for ordinary mortals, or for anything but special wear. Fortunately, however, there is left for these a great variety of attractive and beautiful embroidered fabrics, which, costing far less, have all the novelty and graceful effect of the more expensive patterns.—N. Why Women are Not Masons.

The question is often asked, why cannot women be Free Masons? A bald-headed Nevada orator, living among the sage brush, far away from all womankind, ventures to answer it as follows: "Women sometimes complain that they are not permitted to enter the lodges and work with the craft in their labors, and learn all there is to be learned in this institution. We will explain the reason. We learn that before the Almighty had finished his work he was in doubt about creating Eve. The creation of the living and creeping thing had been accomplished, and the Almighty had made Adam who was the first Mason, and created for him the finest lodge in the world, and called Paradise No. 1. He caused all the beasts of the field and fowls of the air to pass before Adam, for him to name them, which was a piece of work he had to do alone, that no confusion might thereafter arise from Eve, who he knew would make trouble if she was allowed to participate in it, if he created her beforehand. Adam being fatigued with his first task, fell asleep, and when he awoke found Eve in the lodge with him. Adam being Senior Warden, placed Eve as the pillar of beauty in the south, and they received their instructions from the Grand Master in the east, which, when finished, she immediately called the craft from labor to refreshment. Instead of attending to the duties of her office as she ought, she left her station, violated her obligation and let in an expelled Mason, who had no business there, and went around with him, leaving Adam to look after the jewels. This fellow had been expelled from the Grand Lodge, with several others, some time before. Finding that Eve was no longer trustworthy, and that she had caused Adam to neglect his duty, and had let one in whom he had expelled, the Grand Master closed the lodge and turned them out, setting a faithful Tyler to guard the door with a flaming sword. Adam repented of his folly, went to work like a man and a good Mason, in order to get reinstated again. Not so with Eve! She got angry about it and commenced raising Cain. Adam, on account of his reformation, was permitted to establish lodges and work in the degrees, and while Eve was allowed to join him in his works of charity outside, she was never again permitted to assist in the regular work of the craft. Hence the reason why a woman cannot become an inside Mason."

BEAR SHOOTING IN CANADA.

Thrilling Sport in the Cedar Woods of the Dominion.

W. Thomas, Jun., in Harper's

The forest we had entered was a dense growth of cedars, mixed with spruce and pine. The trees stood close together with low branches, and were plentifully interspersed with windfalls, lying breast-high on rotten branches, and forming an admirable natural abattis against our advancing column of two armed with ax and shot-gun.

George moves on like a shadow straight for the squirrel that still chatters and scolds and swears from the cedar jungle. I veer to the right. We worm ourselves between the thick trunks, are under the thicker branches.

A low "Sh!" catches my ear. I turn toward George. "Here he is!" is written all over his face. He points directly ahead, then shakes his ax, and points and points again.

I look, crouch down and look, but see nothing save the trunks.

George grows impatient. He thinks I do not understand him.

"Le voici! Here he is!" he hisses. But Bruin hears as well as I. "Non le voila! There he goes!"

I hear a whine and a grunt that reminds me of a menagerie and through the trunks and the dead branches of a fallen pine catch a flitting glimpse of shambling blackness.

I fire a snap shot, as I would at a woodcock darting through the alder tops. The smoke hangs under the thick branches and shuts out all before me.

"He's down! Nous l'avons!" yells George. The report of the gun has broken the spell of the forest silence, and George changes from a serpent to a tiger.

"No," he cries; "he's off again. Fire!"

I fire my left barrel through the smoke with "eye of faith," and cramming in a couple of fresh cartriges, George and I rush on, if any mode of progress through a tangled cedar swamp can be called a rush. We kick and wrest off the dry dead branches, scramble over the fallen pine, but the bear! Nowhere a sign of him. Nothing but forest and silence.

George keeps on; I do my best to follow. He glides along like a cat, in one hand an uplifted ax, descending now and then to sever an opposing bough. He gets over the ground two feet to my one.

"Le voila, qui s'en va! There he goes again! Venez! Come on," cries George, and I perform the speediest coming on of which I was capable. Slow enough it is, though. Every few steps the tangled branches of a fallen cedar must be burst through; but on I press, and scramble, and tumble, and crawl, till George is reached. He stands on a prostrate tree, ax upraised, head bent forward and to one side—an admirable statue of alertness.

"Ecoutez! Listen!" he whispers.

A moment's stillness. Then a crackling, loud and near, up the hillside. George jumps through the thicket, and springs up the slope like a flash.

Follow him? I could as easily flit up to heaven without wings. So I scrambled out through the level swamp. It is said that "blood will tell;" I can swear that weight will. The burden of my two hundred pounds handicapped me in this swamp race with a bear. Every thicket I crawled through, every windfall I scrambled over, told on me, till at last I was forced to halt. With prespiration bursting from every pore, and breath only caught in gasps, I leaned against a tree and imagined the feelings of the losing horse in a race. My heart beat loudly as the humming of a patridge, the whole forest seemed to reverberate with its quick thud, thud, thud, and the blood leaped to my head and temples till my brain was in a whirl.

While the trees were dancing before my reeling sight, I thought, "What an unlucky wight am I! After twenty years of small game shooting, to at last meet a bear in his haunts in the forest, get within thirty yards of him, on the point of gratifying one of the pet ambitions of my life, and then to bang away a couple of shots like a fool with the buck ague, while my noble quarry cooly makes off, and I am left empty-handed."

Worse than that, the brute runs away so slowly that George sees him again and again—keeps up with him, in fact. Alas, my "too, too solid flesh!" Were I a light, nimble fellow like George, I might have shot a bear—yes, a half dozen times over. And then my gun. What a fool to bring a little snipe-gun into the woods in quest of the king of the forests, the beast before which all others quail, from the Atlantic to the Mississippi, and then to fire away at this lordly game as I would pull trigger on a woodcock! One bird missed, up flies another. But where shall I find another bear, when I have been all my life getting up with the first one? Then, if I had only shot him what yarns I would spin to my sporting friends—

"Le voici encore! Here he is again!" sounded George's voice, loud and clear, through the forest, and cut short my reverie.

My heart stilled, and my brain steadied in an instant. Again I sprung forward. "I may get him yet; I may retrieve my fortune," thought I, as I dragged, crawled and pushed myself ahead through the underbrush.

George hears me crashing along, and shouts from the mountain-side, "He's makin' down by the lake. Right ahead o'yer. Look out for him."

I scramble on, impelled by one single, strong desire—to get one good fair shot at the bear.

I keep on and on. Not a word from George. At my right through the leaves I catch bright glimpses of the lake, sleeping in the sunlight. I slacken my pace. All is silent as a sanctuary. "Well, the bear is off and George with him. I'll keep on slowly, cool off, and perhaps get my 'second wind' that we read about, whatever they may be." So thinking, I sling myself upon a fallen cedar that lay breast-high across my route, swing my legs over, sit and rest for a moment, then leisurely drop down on the other side.

"Knar-r-r-r-r!" And from under a cedar only seven paces away a mass of blackness springs for me, sudden and swift.

I had not time to take a step. Had time allowed, there is no opportunity. The fallen cedar is at my back; I am pinioned between its branches. But no thought of retreat or dodging enters my mind. There is time but for one single impulse, and that is—shoot. My gun is in my right hand, both barrels full-cock. Instantly I pitched it to my shoulder, yet in this instant the whole forest scene, with the on-dashing, black brute in the centre, is accurately and indelibly photographed upon my sight. I see the beast leaping on all fours, hind-quarters high, fore-shoulders low, head down and askew, snout turned to right, lip curled up like a snarling dog, teeth chattering, and black eyes gleaming with a devilish light. On comes the monster, with his vibrating, grunting growl, Knar-r-r-r! As the gun swings up to my face I glance along the barrels, and see the snapping teeth of the leaning brute within four feet of my gun-muzzle. I fire. The beast falls forward with a heavy thud at my feet.

I lower my gun, and, with finger on the left trigger, press the muzzle against the monster's head. It moves not. Every fibre of my being thrills with a wild, intense delight.

"Dead!" I yell, with savage glee.

And from up the mountain-side comes George's answering shout, "Bravo, mon frere!"

And now comes George himself, crashing and bounding down the steep, and swinging his axe aloft. He jumps over our fallen foe, embraces me, dances about like a true Frenchman, shouting "Bravo, mon frere! Nous avons vaincu notre ennemi. Sacre! You old black devil you! Voici—here you are—Mort. Aha!" and, grasping me with both hands, words fail us, and we give voice to the wild joy of victory in one long "Halloo!" that wakes the slumbering echoes of the summer lake. The veneer of a thousand years of civilization dropped from us like a garment, and the original savage, the fighting animal, the true man within, laughed with a zest that civilization knows not of.

Jim hears our shout from down the lake, catches its meaning, gleefully halloos in reply, and paddles swiftly to us in the pirogue.

"Here he is, Jim," quoth I. "Voici l'ours."

Jim peers over the shaggy brute, looks up, takes off his hat, and bowing toward me, says with the air of a diplomat offering a sentiment at a royal banquet: "C'est bien bon, Monsieur, beaucoup de pouvoir a votre bras, et meme plus a votre fusil."

Taking Bruin by the paws, we slid her down the bank.

"She'll weigh about four hundred said Jim, reflectively, as we lifted her into the pirogue. "But, then, they're dreadful lean this summer. Late in fall, now, she'd go another hundred, sure."

THE CLOTHING TRADE.

A Sale of the Coat that was Worn an Hour or Two by Mr. Jones.

From the New Orleans Times.

"Herman," said a Poydras street merchant clothier, addressing his clerk, "haf ve sold all of dose overgoats vat vas left over from last vinter?"

"No sir, dere was dree of dem left yet."

"Vell ve must sell 'em right avay, as de vinter vill not last, you know, Herman. Pring me one of de goats and I vill show you somedings about de pisness. An eight-dollar overcoat was handed him by his clerk, and smoothing it out, he took a buckskin money purse from the showcase, and stuffing it full of paper, dropped it into one of the pockets.

"Now, Herman, my poy," he continued "vatch me sell dat goat. I haf sold over dirty-fife of dem shust de same vay, und I vant to deech you de pisness. Ven de next gustomer comes in de shop I vill show de vay Rube Hoffenstein, mine broder in Detroit, sells his cloding und udder dings."

A few minutes later a negro, in quest of a suitable pair of cheap shoes, entered the store. The proprietor advanced smiling and enquired:

"Vat is it you wish?"

"Yer got any cheap shoes hyar?" asked the negro.

"Blenty of dem, my frent, blenty; at any brice you vant."

The negro stated that he wanted a pair of brogans, and soon his pedal extremities were incased in them, and a bargain struck As he was about to leave, the proprietor called him back.

"I ain't gwine ter buy nuffin else. I'se got all I want," said the negro, sullenly.

"Dot may be so, my dear sir," replied the proprietor, "but I shust vant you to look at dis goat. The negro buttoned up the coat, thrust his hands in the pockets and felt the purse. A peaceful smile played over his face when his touch disclosed to his mind the contents of the pockets, but he choked down his joy and inquired:

"Who did you say wore this hyar coat!"

"Vy, Misder Jones vot owns de pank on Canal street."

"What yer gwine to ax fur it."

"Dwendy dollars."

"Dat's powerful high price fur dis coat, but I'll take it."

"Herman, here, wrap up dis goat fur de shentleman und drow in a cravat; it vill make him look nice mit de ladies."

"Nebber mind, I'll keep de coat on," replied the negro, and pulling out a roll of money he paid for it and left the store.

While he was around the next corner moaning over the stuffed purse, Hoffenstein said to his clerk:

"Herman, fix up anudder von of dose goats the same vay, und doan forget to dell dem dot Misder Jones, vot runs de pank on Canal street, vore it yesterday."

THE "CONSEQUENCES."

The Practical Game That was Played on Missouri Brown.

From the Chicago Times.

They were playing an insidious game, invented by the devil or some of his followers, called "Consequences." Presuming that our readers know how the thing is done, we shall only detail what happened.

Joe Smith and Missouri Brown had been sweethearts for some time, though she never would say yes when he asked her to marry him. In fact she flitted with some other fellows in a manner highly demoralizing to Joe. He, poor fellow, had stood it a good while, and had come to the conclusion to bring things to a focus, so to speak, and had spoken to his friend Tom Brown, a cousin of Missouri's, on the subject. The result was that on this particular evening Tom proposed the fiendish game above alluded to.

The slips of paper were prepared, passed around, written on, opened and read. The first one was something after this order:

"Joe Smith and Lizzie Simpson met in a corn-field—they were playing the piano—he said, 'My darling, I love you'—She said, 'I'm hungry'—The consequences were that they fell in the gutter—and the people said, 'Twere better to laugh than to be sighing.'"

This was deemed such a success that the paper was passed around again. But wicked Tom Brown, with an eye to Joe's case, "fixed things," and when the paper was ready to be read he slyly substituted one he had prepared beforehand. It was based on a scene that occurred between Joe and Missouri only a few nights before, and unknown to any but herself and her lover, and she wasn't afraid he'd give it away.

Here is what the substitute paper contained.

"Joseph Smith and Missouri Brown—met in the back parlor—They embraced—He said, 'My darling, I must kiss you'—she said, 'Oh, Joe, you mustn't,' but she did—The consequences were that he kissed her about forty times and she didn't squeal—And the people all said, 'Why on earth don't those two fools get married?'"

Missouri blushed, and the crowd howled. In the midst of the uproar the young lady rushed out of the room and Joe after her. She was going right home, she said, indignantly, and she did, and Joe with her. And although she only lived some four squares away, it took them from 9 to 10.30 o'clock to walk it. It is observed that Missouri doesn't flirt any more, and that Joe has begun to wear a plug hat, from which one may infer that the "consequences" of that night's work will be all right.

The Queen's Sons.

London Letter in Chicago Tribune.

The Duke of Edinburg has just been appointed to the command of the "Channel Squadron"—a very lucrative post in the navy, and which is almost a sinecure. This appointment has been made over the heads of several unemployed Admirals, who are justified in resenting this quite common nepotism which circumstances the wisher, and, as far as decency and authorities will permit, the relatives of the Queen. All her Majesty's sons are well provided for, and yet she is never satisfied with their worldly prospects, but shoves them into every vacant post where there is money. It is estimated that the Queen saves annually from her parliamentary allowance alone $500,000. She receives annually $2,750,000. Her Majesty's personal wealth is said to be enormous, and her investments are sources of constant thought and care with her. Notwithstanding the nation pays the queen this £550,000 a year, she does not maintain her own family out of that sum, for we find the following amounts voted from time to time by parliament at her majesty's request: Crown Princess of Germany, £8,000; Prince of Wales, £40,000; Marchioness of Lorne, £26,000; Duke of Connaught, £25,000; Duke of Albany, £25,000; Duchess of Mecklenburg Streitz, £3,000; Duke of Cambridge, £13,000; Princess of Teck, £5,000. Besides all these figures there are "royal perquisites" that amount to vast sums, such as the £50,000 the Prince of Wales receives annually from the Duchy of Cornwall. However, according to the glorious British constitution royalty can do no wrong, and they who hold to the divine sanction of royalty must pay well those who hold its credentials.

A Deutche Scientist on Woman.

Schopenhauer, the German philosopher, had reached, with regard to women, a perfect view parallel to that of Carlyle toward man—namely, that all which is called progress and elevation has been in an evil way. As Carlyle held that the perfected social order for man is the rule of the strong hand, or clublaw, so Schopenhauer held that the proper domestic order is absolute subjection for women. He argued that all the so called elevation of women has been only the inflation of the few into uselessness, at the cost of the greater degradation of the mass, also that the more woman has been elevated the more she has grown discontented and unhappy.

He held that this abnormal foisting of woman degraded man, and thus resulted in degrading all; that by keeping up the dignity of man the race is elevated, and by letting down to an equality with woman the race is leveled downward; also, that polygamy is necessary to man's dignity; domestic happiness, to the welfare of the race, and especially to a natural provision for all women. It is likely that some of the strong minded women of the present day will not assent to Schopenhauer's doctrine. A friend to her sex has contributed her translation of extracts setting forth his views, which are printed herewith:

"Between men there is by nature only indifference; but between women there is naturally enmity."

"When nature divided the human race in halves, she did not carry the incision directly through the middle. In all popularity the distinction between the positive and negative poles is not only a qualitative one, but at the same time a quantitative. Thus have the Oriental and ancient nations regarded the women, and have therefore accorded them, more correctly in just position than we with our antique French gallantry and insipid woman veneration, that highest bloom of Christian German idiocy, which has only earned this to make them so arrogant and inconsiderate that one is sometimes reminded of the holy monkeys in Benares, who, in consciousness of their holiness and inviolability, considered everything made for them."

"The European marriage law, considering woman as the equal of man, proceeds from a false presumption."

"In our own monogamian part of the world getting married means simply to have one's rights, and double one's duties.

"When the laws invested women with equal rights to men, they should have also endowed them with a masculine understanding."

"The more those rights and honors which the laws concede to women surmount her natural condition, so much the more do they limit the number of those women who really participate in the granted favors, and take from all the remaining women as much rights accorded by nature as they had given to the others, rights beyond what is natural. For in this abnormally advantageous position, which the monogamian regulation and thereto subjoined marriage laws have made, men hesitate to make so great a sacrifice, and enter upon so unequal a compact. While, therefore, among the polygamous nations every woman finds a support, among the monogamian the number of marriageable women is limited; and there remains a great number of females, who in the higher classes vegetate as useless old maids, but in the lower are pushed to hard and inadequate labor, or, * * * All the here enumerated women pushed into such fearful position are but an unavoidable balance to the European Lady, with her pretension and arrogance. For the female sex, considered, as a whole, polygamy is therefore a benefit.

"It is not to be intelligently disputed that a man whose wife is a chronic invalid, or childless, or who has become altogether too old for him, should take another.

"In this way will woman be reduced to her just and natural position, as a subordinate being and the LADY, that monster of European civilization and of Christian-German idiocy, with her ridiculous pretensions to respect and honor, will be thrust out of the world, and there will remain only women, but no more unhappy women with which Europe is now full."

LOVES A STORM.

How Butler Takes to His Yacht When a Strong Wind Blows.

From The New York Sun.

General Butler's hobby is his yacht America. She lies now in Boston harbor, with a crew aboard, and some day, soon, when the notion takes him and a big storm threatens, he will take a cab, drive at full tilt for her wharf, and start for someplace beyond the reach of telegrams. When he took his southern trip in his yacht from Fortress Monroe last spring, he waited before going to sea until he could get a good northwest storm. When General Hazen, of the weather bureau, in response to his telegram, sent him word that a northwest wind was coming, and that it was probably strong enough to suit him; General Butler crowded on all the sail he could, settled himself in the cockpit, planted his arms akimbo, and audaciously faced the storm. The America skimmed the waves with such speed that General Butler declared that he would yet sail into some European port with her and astonish the timid yachtsmen. He puffs away all care at the end of his finger tips when he treads the deck of the America, eats four meals a day, has a game of penny ante with his guests at night, and is up early the next day looking out for a storm. If there could be found a sea of perpetual storms, General Butler would probably make for it. There are enough amusing stories told of his adventures at sea to fill a summer book of fun. It is said that his yacht never yet carried enough sail for him, and that he has not yet met a storm that has even disturbed him. Sometimes his sturdy old captain (Mr. Reid), who is as strong-minded in his way as Gen. Butler is in his, has a wordy encounter with the general about the chances the latter seems to have to take, and once he is said to have told General Butler to take his "——old yacht" and run it as he pleased, when in face of the trepidation of the crew and the prudence of the captain the general wanted to crowd on more sail. Mr. Reed tells of several hairbreadth escapes, as well as many amusing adventures, he has had with General Butler at sea, and some of his crew have predicted that if General Butler dies at all, he will become food for whales. When the storm runs so high as to make every one on board sea sick except the captain and the owner General Butler is sure to be found seated in the cockpit with an old, mysterious smile curving about his feet.

THE DAY WHEN CHRIST WAS BORN.

King Magnus held right merry cheer
In honor of the Christmas-tide
At Ladir; and on every side
His courtmen and good bonders sat.
There as folk talked of this and that,
And drank, and all were blithe enow,
Amid the drifting of the snow,
And howling of the wind without,
Within the porch folk heard a shout,
And opening of the outer door:
Then one came in, who to the floor
Cast down the weight of snow, and stood
Undoing of his fur-lined hood
And muttering in his beard the while.
The king gazed on him with a smile,
Then said at last, "What is it then?
Art thou called one of my good men,
And art thou of the country-side,
Or hast thou mayhap wandered wide?
Come, sit thee down, and eat and drink,
And yet thou hast some news, I think."

The man said, "News from over sea.
Of Mary and the Trinity
And goodman Joseph, do I bring:
Nowell, Nowell, Nowell, O King!"

Inward he stalked on, therewithal,
But stopped amidmost of the hall,
And cast to earth his cloak and hood,
And there in glittering raiment stood;
While the maids went about the board
And deftly the cups river poured,
And, 'mid great clank of ewer and horn,
Men drank the day when Christ was born.

DICK'S CHRISTMAS.

I.—FLIGHT.

"I'll be hanged if I touch the cards again!" said the Englishman. And he flung half the pack into the open fire.

The Kentuckian laughed. "I am as honest as I know how," said he; "but I have known the knave of spades by his back, and the ace of clubs, too, for the last three deals."

"Bring some clean cards, you little pirate!" cried Bastide to the pale little boy who was waiting, "and be quick about it. Here's a quarter of a dollar to grease the elevator."

The boy laughed and fled. He did not trust the elevator, but almost flew down the stairs to the office of the manager. To his disgust, although the office was open, no one was there. Dick ran right and left; he found two or three waiters, but no one could tell him where Mickliss, the head clerk, had gone, or Steedman, his second. Dick hated to lose his quarter dollar and his reputation for promptness. He had too often been sent on such errands to be ignorant where the cards were kept. He opened the cupboard and took out four packs. On the slate which hung on the door of the cupboard, he wrote in his best writing, "Dick, for 44, fore pax." He scudded back to the stairway, fortunately found the elevator ascending, entered it, and returned to 44.

"Oh, you have been down town for them, have you?" said the good-natured Kentuckian. He tore off the cover, and they began their game again.

They had played, perhaps, half an hour, almost in silence, and little Dick was really asleep in the embrasure of the window, when the door flew open, and Mickliss, the head clerk named above, stormed in in a passion of rage.

He caught poor Dick by the collar and cuffed him on both ears, shook him right and left, and flung him upon the floor. He was about to kick him as he lay, when Bastide laid his strong hand on his arm, and said: "If you have any accounts to settle, settle them with me. I bade the boy bring the cards, and bring them at once. If any one stole them, I stole them."

Mickliss was far too drunk to care who or what was the man who checked him, and a storm of quarrel began, with which there is no need to sully these pages. Long before it was over little Dick, whose woes were the origin of the Iliad of those battles, had risen from the floor, and had fled from the room, unnoticed by all the combatants.

II.—SAFETY.

Dick wasted no time in descending the stairs or in leaving the building. He caught his cap from its peg in the office as he passed out, dodged into the first cross street he came to, and fled up town. Once in the street, he knew very well that his escape was nigh certain.

But he did not loiter on the snow-trodden sidewalk till he had put a couple of miles between him and his oppressor. Then in the darkness and silence he began to plan for his night's quarters. And he was only too well versed in the opportunities open in New York to young gentlemen of his freedom of life when a night's lodging was necessary. A high picket fence bounded one side of the lonely street where he was. Dick went over it like a cat, and found himself in a large, long yard, where stood many Pullman cars, empty. He climbed high enough on the outside of one to try its windows. All were fast till he came to the end, where a careless porter had left a wash-room window a little open. Dick pushed it up far enough to enter, closed it again, felt his way back into the car, opened a seat in the dark, and in five minutes had forgotten the gambling saloon, and Mickliss, and Steedman, and was not even dreaming of Christmas joys. Better than dreaming, he was enjoying the blessed unconsciousness of a tired child's sleep.

It was well nigh 8 o'clock before he waked. The motion of the car aroused him. Dick had no thought of receiving another thrashing. He watched his opportunity to drop himself unnoticed from the window upon the station platform, and found himself in the great Vanderbilt station on Forty-second street—a place where it is quite as difficult to go out as it is to go in.

But Dick did not distress himself. And here he was right. Before long the platform was alive with travelers eager to secure good seats, and glad in the promise of their Christmas journey home. One immense party of old and young—men, women, children, pet dogs, maids and men servants—passed Dick on their way to the parlor cars. After they had swept by, the boy saw that a little girl in the company had dropped her enormous doll. Dick seized the doll and followed.

The crowd was so great, however, that before he had found the right child in the parlor car, and had explained about the recovery of the doll, he felt, by the throb under his feet, that the train was in motion. For the first time in the whole adventure Dick was disconcerted. He had meant to leave the saloon, and Mickliss, and Steedman? Yes. And he had left them. But had he meant to leave New York? Not he! New York was the best home he had had, after all, since he came there as a little boy. Little Alice saw his dismay, and so did her nurse, both grateful because he had recovered Brynhilde, the doll. The nurse said, kindly, that perhaps he could leave the train at Harlem.

Perhaps he could.

Dick tried to.

He stood on the platform, to jump off if there were any chance. The train "slowed up" a little as they passed Harlem. Ah me! The most attractive spectacle was going forward which a boy like Dick could contemplate. Actually he could see the steam fire engine going to the fire, of which he could see the smoke. And he, free from Mickliss, and from Steedman, still could not assist at the fire! Was ever any fate so cruel? Every stroke of the alarm bell, as they whizzed by, bade him stop. But the train was relentless and bore him on.

It is a strange thing to say, but the little fellow's heart rose in his mouth, and he choked with as much emotion as if he had left something more tangible and more affectionate behind. Somehow the dim thought of his mother came up to him, though his mother had never lived in New York. She was dead before his hard lot took him there. But she bade him go there; she knew he was there. If, now, he went rambling over the world, would she know where to find him and how to take care of him? If Dick could have analyzed his vague sentiment, it would have come out in that question. But he was not the boy to stand blubbering, with a black porter looking on and wondering, and, finding that the train would not stop, he went back and made that report to Miss Alice and the friendly nurse. Then these two children, and a German boy there was named Rudolph, fell playing together, Dick, perhaps, the leader of the revels. There was an affectionate gentleness in the boy, mixed with a certain independence, bred in his Ishmaelite life, which easily made him a teacher in such little sports as were possible with their space and material. He showed wonderful ability with a cup and ball, which Alice was taking to her grandfather's as one of the presents she was to give. And so steady are the runs on some of the levels of that road that they even succeeded in making card houses stand for thirty seconds, and when they fell the joy of the fall was equal to the joy of the construction.

Nor was Dick ejected at the first watering station, as he expected, and as the intelligent reader will hope if he be a stockholder interested in railways. No; the train was full of Christmas passengers. The parties both of Alice's father and of Rudolph's father were large, and the conductor, as he hurried through, counting one set and counting another, allowing for babies and half tickets and the rest, never made out that he had one extra boy of eleven years in the car. Dick was not, indeed, long enough in one spot to be easily counted by any one. It was not till the whole of the party to which he was attached arrived at Meriden, and dismounted, not till he helped Alice with Brynhilde to take her place in Uncle Nahum's elegant carriage that an explanation took place. Alice's father, who had been quietly watching the boy's pretty ways, told him that he ought not to stand in the cold without his overcoat; and then the nurse explained, what Dick was too proud to tell, that he had no overcoat, and, indeed, had not meant to leave New York. Mr. Hulme took the boy back into the warmer station house, and Dick told him frankly that he had run away from a gambling house, had slept in the Pullman, and by mistake had come away from the city. Whatever the boy's faults were, he was always straightforward, and told the whole of his story.

Mr. Hulme called his brother-in-law. "Nahum, here is a stowaway, whom we have brought by mistake from New York." And in twenty more words he told the whole story.

"One boy more or less will not be felt at mother's," said Nahum, laughing, and he called out to one of the drivers, "Take out another blanket, and let this boy wrap himself up in it." And Dick was tumbled into the fourth carryall of the great cortege, and to his joy found that it was the one into which Alice and the good-natured nurse had mounted already.

III.—DICK'S CHRISTMAS.

In the radiant Christmas hospitalities of Mrs. Throop there was indeed room enough for Dick, as there would have been for a dozen more of his kind had fate chosen to bring them. And in the easy interchanges between sitting room and kitchen, and the simple relations which governed the intercourse of those in both of these not unequal wings of that household Dick did not find his unexpected visit a bore to anybody. Nobody was worried by his arrival, and nobody asked where he belonged or why he was there. He had a knack of making himself useful, as had been seen, and he had, as has been seen also, that other knack, less usual, of getting out of the way when he was not wanted.

All parties were better for their night's sleep, and early on Christmas morning, high festivities began. To his real surprise, Dick found hanging on the inside of the door of his little bedroom a large blue yarn stocking, bigger ten-fold than his own, and in it were all sorts of funny gingerbread men and horses, barley candy statuettes, jumping jacks, and other droll little inexpensive toys. Such minor gifts in the Throop-Hulme household were intrusted to Santa Claus at midnight. After two or three breakfasts had been served in various rooms for the enormous party of cousins, after family prayers had been gone through with after a fashion, one joyous procession was made into the "best parlor"—a place reverent even with a certain superstition—and here were stacked great heaps of white paper parcels, from the tall dressing glass on two legs, which was draped in a white domino, down to the diamond ring for grandma, which also was enveloped in a parcel so large that grandma could never guess. "Three hundred and fifty-one presents, if you will believe me," said Aunt Sybil. "There are thirty-two different people to receive, and some of them have more than twenty."

And among the presents Dick also was remembered. He had followed the gay procession a little doubtfully, but because every other member of the household did. And when "the piles were called," as the phrase went, quite early, indeed, Dick's name was called. What his last name was no one knew. Alice had promptly changed some of her plans, so that she had a backgammon board for him. It was, of, made to resemble two impossible books, and they were lettered, to Dick's admiration, "History of the Shah of Persia."

Mr. Hulme knew the exigencies of Christmas well enough to always buy a dozen extra pocket knives for boys, and one of these found its way to Dick; and Jules Verne books, and home-knit mittens, and other timely gifts made up a good "pile" for the stowaway.

The boy had never before received a present in his life. He had been "tipped" often enough, as by Bastide, when he gave him the fatal twenty-five cents. But a tip was something he earned. He had had kicks and cuffs given him, which he had not earned. But till now nobody had ever given him anything he wanted, merely for love's sake. To see thirty people together, giving to each other such beautiful things, to find that he had been remembered also in the rush of all night's preparation, all this made the tears come to poor Dick's eyes, as Mickliss' brutality or the oaths of the cross gamblers would never have summoned them. The whole fete was delightful to him, none the less. And when, of a sudden, he became quite the hero of it for a minute, because he could set up a certain parlor croquet board, of which the mechanism puzzled Uncle Nahum. Dick received very prettily the friendly compliments of his hosts.

And now it was made clear why, after the riot-rout of the stockings before daylight, breakfast had been so early, and no one had been allowed a second morning nap. The time was only too limited between breakfast and church-going, and at 11 o'clock the "whole boodle of them," as Uncle Nahum called the caravan, from grand-mamma down to little Tom Roussillon, had to boot and spur for church. The carriages appeared for the oldsters, and the youngsters went on foot. Mrs. Hulme had found a fit overcoat for Dick, and he and Alice trudged along together.

Church-going was a matter with which Dick was not so familiar as card-playing or billiard-marking. There was a certain mission Sunday school, to which a certain Swedish boy lured him when there was a good bounty for recruits. But attendance there did not involve attendance on the more stately services of the church itself. The boy was only the more ready to listen and to feel. As it happened, from bad luck or good luck, the minister took Home for his subject.

He might well have been fired in his treatment of it, as he saw the admirable family gathering in and around the Hulme and Throop and Roussillon pews. Near as he was in friendship to half that party, he may well have thought that when he spoke of a happy home as Christ's best Christmas gift to the world, they were all, in the fashion of children or of men, in sympathy with him. Alas! there was one among that happy party to whom every word was a dagger. What home was the little boy knew well enough. He had seen it last night and this morning. But it was just what he seemed to have no place nor part in. He remembered Christmas a year ago, though to him the year had been almost interminable. Then he was a runner in a hotel, and he well recollected how hard the pull on the boys was before people were willing to go to bed. But the boy was brave. And the words, half comprehended, of the preacher, gave him something to think of. At least he could look forward, and what he would look forward to was something like what was around him here. Some time or other he would know how to make little fellows happy, as this clever Uncle Nahum knew so well. Some time. Yes. Where? Why, New York, of course. He should be lost here in an hour. In New York he knew every turn and corner. He loved New York, and New York loved him.

And so, as they went home from church and Alice made him listen to the new chimes which her father had given to the congregation for his Christmas present, although the bell-ringers played Antioch and Christmas, it seemed to the homesick Dick to be the same sound he heard at Harlem, which bade him not to be frightened away from the city that was yet to be his home.

IV.—WHITHER NOW?

It was, therefore, the sermon which governed Dick's thought in an interview he had with Mr. Nahum Throop and Mr. Hulme the next morning. Hulme had given himself not only Christmas day but St. Stephen's day also for a holiday. In all the glee of old home life, however, he did not forget the little stowaway. He had an early council with Mr. Throop, and they sent for Dick even before breakfast. The boy came laughing, and bringing with him his precious backgammon board.

"What have you there?" said Uncle Nahum, seeing how carefully the boy carried it.

"It's full of mice, sir," said the boy. "They rattled about in my bedroom in the night, and I caught them." And he led the way, with the wondering Tom and Alice, to the ever-running stream in the back passage, opened the box over the great tank, and to Alice's amazement six mice, as soon as they recovered from a sort of stupor, jumped into the water.

"Why, it is like Cinderella," she said. And to the wondering gentlemen Dick explained that he heard the mice rioting in the night and thought fit to catch them. It was dark, he said, and he had nothing but this backgammon board. He remembered two figs which had been given him as forfeits in a game the night before, and which Alice had put in his side pockets. In the dark he had built a little tower of checkermen and figs combined, which held the backgammon board a little open. "You see one mouse cannot pull the fig out if you weight the trap; then another comes to help him, and when there are five or six you catch them all," said the boy eagerly.

Mr. Throop looked on, amazed and amused. "Were you born in Connecticut, Dick?" said he.

"Yes, sir," said Dick, proudly. "But my mother, when she died, sir"—and the boy sobbed—"told me to go to New York, and I went there."

The two gentlemen looked at each other, and for a moment there was silence. "I had been asking Mr. Hulme," said Uncle Nahum, "whether he would like to leave you with me—how you would like to go into the shops, and learn, before you are a man, how we silver steel, how we melt and mold silver, and how we make the knives and forks and spoons for hungry people."

"And I said to Uncle Nahum," said Mr. Throop, "that you should come to him if you chose. But I said you were a New York boy, and perhaps you would like better to go back with me to-morrow. I can not take you into the bank; we have nothing for boys to do there. But I can find some one who will teach you what your friend Milkrip never taught you, and you seem already not to lie and not to steal."

Then followed a long talk with which the reader need not be troubled. But it was pretty clear all along where the boy's affections were. Such home as he had, poor child, was in the great city whose streets he knew only too well. The two gentlemen nodded to each other, and Mr. Hulme said:

"New York it shall be, my boy; to New York you shall go."

"You are not mad with me?" said Dick, turning eagerly to Uncle Nahum. "You have been so kind. I will do just as you say."

"No, Dick; I am not mad at all. I say just what he says. Go to New York and grow to be a man there; and when you are a man, Dick, look out for the little fellows who want a home."

V.—THE SHAH.

And so Dick went to New York. Ah, me! if he would only take time enough to-day only to tell the story of what fell to his lot not so many years afterward, Gil Blas himself could not tell a more varied tale!

The smallest errand boy in the largest wholesale grocery in the city. It was hard for Dick to get that sense of the "We" without which such a concern never really prospers. It was not in one month, nor in two, that Dick learned to say, "We telegraphed to-day for twenty cargoes of coffee," but the store was in good training, and in time Dick learned this trick as well as the bigger boys had learned it.

Everybody in theory meant to be kind to him. As often as once a month Mr. Roche, the junior partner, to whom Mr. Hulme had intrusted him, remembered to ask him how he was getting on, and if he had a good boarding-house. After a year John Roche, a son, came into the store. He took to Dick, took a fancy to him, saw to the boarding-house, had Dick in his own Sunday-school class, wrote to Mr. Brace about an evening school, and in general saw that the boy did not go to the dogs. John Roche, under Providence, was the making of Dick, and the boy grew up a ready, thrifty, kind-hearted, willing boy, a boy whom no one could spare, who helped along where he was, who did not make reply, and did not question why, but found out all the more because he did not question.

A sad day it was for Dick when John Roche made his first voyage to the East.

"Dick," he said, "I am going to see our own coffee people. I am going to see where coffee grows, and how."

"Oh, Mr. Roche, take me?"

"Dick, that was the first thing I proposed. And Mr. Balestier really thought of it. I hoped you could come. But they sent for old Portman here, and he said that he could not do without you. He said that since young Sweeney ran away he could not spare you. I said it was hard on you that you should lose the voyage; and that all ends by this: you are to have a hundred a year added to your pay from the first of last month, and at Christmas another lift. But, Dick, you know that I shall miss you sadly, and you must write to me. And what shall I bring you? I would say cheroots, if you smoked."

"Bring yourself, Mr. John, and a feather from a roc's tail."

"Dick, you shall have the largest roc's egg I find."

And so John Roche sailed, and Dick was left behind. All the better for him. Now he was nobody's pet. He was an important factor in the concern. Old Portman had been made to confess his importance; that was a great thing. Mr. Balestier had learned his name; that in itself was a great thing. From that moment Dick was on his feet in the store.

And from the beginning no one in the establishment had more letters from John Roche, or fuller, than Dick had.

And when John Roche returned, when Dick met him at quarantine to come up the bay with him in the ship, was not each of them proud of the other?

"Dick," said Mr. John, after the first greeting, "I believe I have made your fortune."

"I hope you have made your own," said the boy.

"Dick, I was back in North Borneo, the wildest region you ever saw. A rum old rajah, with heaven knows how many black men in line of battle, made a swell dinner party for me and Forrester and all. It was the right thing for us all to carry presents of compliment. One man took a revolver, and one took a set of chessmen. Poor me, I did not know what to take; but Forrester said the rajah would like your new pattern for a mousetrap. Well, I knew it would please you to have the thing go so far, so, though it was your present to me, I took that."

"Please me!" cried Dick: "I think so! But since you went away I have had no heart for that. You told me to take out a patent, but I have done nothing."

"Time for that now," replied John Roche. "I tell you, Dick, your fortune is made. We showed the black king how to set it with little scraps of lump sugar, as you taught me. Well, we all went to bed early that night in the old sachem's hacienda. And, Dick, I swear to you, the next morning that thing was full of cockroaches. Whether they have any mice in his palace I do not know. This I know—that his cockroaches are as big as mice. While they were rampaging round in your trap, and nibbling at the old Shah's sugar, some dozen of them sprang the thing, and so caught themselves and a hundred or so of their mothers and grandmothers all together. Dick, the next week this shah, or rajah, or sultan, or whatever he is, sent down to the ship, oh, I do not know how much cinnaman, to say he wanted a thousand of the 'American Snapdragons.' I sent word that we had none left, but that a thousand should go out to him as soon as I returned. And now it seems that you have not even a patent, Dick."

But, as some readers may recollect if they will try, a sufficient patent was soon obtained. What South American country seat, what palace in Madagascar, what elegant hacienda in the Philippines, is now without "the Shah's Christmas box."

For this was the name at last given to Dick's clever contrivance. They studied over several. One was "the Rajah's Repose," one was "the Sultan's Solace," one was the name the Rajah called it, "the American Snapdragon."

But Dick went fondly back to that last Christmas, of which the reader has heard. As he said that the experiment was first tried by the "shah of Persia," and that "The Shah's Christmas-box" it should be.

So "The Shah's Christmas-box" it is.

And so this little story approaches its end. For it was the "shah of Persia," or Alice Hulme who gave the shah to Dick, who, it so proved, so changed Dick's life that he became the great inventor that he is, and never a successful coffee merchant, as he seemed likely to do.

At least people say it was the shah.

Truth is, it was all in the boy's blood. The shah was the first success—in itself a very trivial matter. But, really, every jib-key and cut-off and smoke consumer, and every valuable eccentric or double reacting combination, which has sprung from that quick creature's ready brain, all the relief which his quick wits have given to tired hands or weary feet, every prompt answer which has come from him when a fast and eager world has asked him for his help, has been born from the same native passion to act and to oblige—promptly, swiftly and well—which earned for him his thrashing from Mickliss, which carried to Alice her doll at whatever risk, and which, at the right moment, made a mouse-trap from a checker-board.

A great inventor the boy became.

When he invents a way to make time, and so sits down to write that story which, as above, is to eclipse Gil Blas, he will tell you more than I can. He will tell us how, even as a little boy, he was made welcome at Mr. Hulme's house; how pleased and satisfied he was when, at sixteen years of age, acting as third librarian's assistant at St. Martin's in the Bowery, he gave to Alice Hulme the books her mission class needed; how proud he was when he could walk home with her after the evening meeting of the Sunday school teachers. And, at last, the fateful day came, the anxious morning, the heavenly afternoon. In the morning he closed the triumphant negotiations with the two syndicates, which bought, one for the Western Hemisphere, one for the Eastern, the exclusive rights for Dick's latest and greatest invention. All men know that this invention will revolutionize modern society. In the afternoon, after this success, he dared tell Alice that he loved her better than his life. He was now rich beyond his hope. He could give her the home of a princess if only she loved him.

And Alice blushed, and smiled, and tried to speak, and failed. And Dick took courage, and kissed her. Then she took courage, and said she could be happy with him in a novel. But this, all this, in fit detail, can not be told here. It must be left to "Dick's Memoirs."

It must be the true tale, and not the fancy of an inventor.—Edward Everett Hale.

GRANDMAMMA.

It is many years ago
Since she led
On a tiny tapered toe,
With a tread
Like a whisper, in the dances:
She's the sweetest of romances—
She's the darling of my fancies,
Though she's dead.

Grandpapa was very slim—
Wore a wig
When she courtesied to him
In the jig;
She was modest, prim and pretty,
He was wealthy, wise and witty,
And he joggled through the city
In a gig.

Sixty summers side by side
Did they go.
Then the feeble father died,
And the snow
Streaked the curls that used to tangle
At a captivating angle
By her cheeks, before the bangle
Caught the beaux.

And they say she used to sit
All day through
With her Bible, reading it,
Till she grew
Very old; then came the tragic
End of life's unraveled magic.
For her epitaph no adjec-
Tive will do.

All that I remember now
Is the quaint
Gold-rimmed glasses on her brow
In the paint
Where some portrait-painter caught her—
And a most devoted daughter—
Mother—she who always thought her
Just a saint.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Moral Influence of Cooking.

Some people may be inclined to smile at what I am about to say, viz., that such savory dishes, serving to vary the monotony of the poor hard-working man's ordinary fare, afford considerable moral, as well as physical advantage.

An instructive experience of my own will illustrate this. When wandering alone through Norway in 1856, I lost the track in crossing the Kyolen fjeld, struggled on for twenty-three hours without food or rest, and arrived in a sorry plight at Lom; a very wild region. After a few hours' rest, I pushed on to a still wilder region and still rougher quarters, and continued thus to the great Jostedal table-land, an unbroken glacier of 500 square miles; then descended the Jostedal itself to its opening on the Sogne fjord—five days of extreme hardship, with no other food than flatbrod (very coarse oatcake), and bilberries gathered on the way, varied on one occasion with the luxury of two raw turnips. Then I reached a comparatively luxurious station (Ronnei); where ham and eggs and claret were obtainable. The first glass of claret produced an effect that alarmed me—a craving for more and for stronger drink, that was almost irresistible. I finished a bottle of St. Julien, and nothing but a violent effort of will prevented me from then ordering brandy.

I attribute this to the exhaustion consequent upon the excessive work and insufficient, unsavory food of the previous five days; have made many subsequent observations on the victims of alcohol, and have no doubt that overwork and scanty, tasteless food are the primary source of the craving for strong drink that so largely prevails with such deplorable results among the class that is much exposed to such privation. I do not say that this is the only source of such depraved appetite. It may also be engendered by the opposite extreme of excessive luxurious pandering to general sensuality.

The practical inference suggested by this experience and these observations is, that speech-making, pledge-signing, and blue-ribbon missions can only effect temporary results, unless supplemented by satisfying the natural appetite of hungry people by supplies of food that is not only nutritious, but savory and varied. Such food need be no more expensive than that which is commonly eaten by the poorest of Englishmen, but it must be far better cooked.

A Word About Christmas.

Susan Anne Brown in Century: When what was designed to be a pleasure becomes a burden, it is time to stop and examine it carefully, and see if it is the thing itself which has grown to be such a weight, or whether it is simply an awkward manner of carrying it. Certainly there must be something wrong in any celebration of Christmas which results in serious fatigue of mind and body. During the first three months of the year nothing is more commonly given as a reason for ill health than an overstrain during the holidays. "She got so worn out at Christmas," or "she worked too hard in finishing her Christmas presents," or "the week before Christmas she was tired out with shopping," are excuses which appear as surely as January and February come. The question must sometimes occur to every one, whether all this worry and wear of heart and hand and brain are really worth while. Is there not some better way of celebrating this day of days than for women to wear themselves out in making or buying pretty trifles for people who already have more than they can find room for? Setting aside all effort of eyes and fingers, the mental strain is intense. It is a remarkable fact that, although Christmas has been kept on the 25th day of December for more than 1,000 years, its arrival seems as unexpected as if it had been appointed by the president. No one is ready for it, although last year every one resolved to be so, and about the middle of December there begins a rush and hurry which is really more weary than a May moving. Above all things, if you give presents, be more anxious to give something which "supplies a want" than to send some pretty trifle which can only prove in the end an additional care. There are numberless things which can be procured, without a wear and tear of mind and body which makes the recipient feel as David did of the water from the well of Bethlehem, that what cost so much was too valuable to be accepted.

"Cracker" Women.

Carolina correspondence New York Evening Post: The question of immorality among these people is being agitated just now by the Southern press. Marriages are not always solemnized among them. If a man sees a woman who pleases him, and if she "takes a shine to him"—as they express it—they often do not deem a minister's services necessary, but go to housekeeping at once. The people here seem inclined to excuse this custom upon the ground that under the law of the State of South Carolina, if a man lives with a woman as his wife, and openly acknowledges her to be his spouse, she is as legally wedded as if the ceremony had been performed. There are cases reported occasionally where one of these "crackers" makes his own divorce laws. Cases have been known where a man has traded off his wife to a neighbor either for another woman or provision. They hold women, sometimes, like currency. If they have one of forty they trade her for two twenties. This is not often done, fortunately, although a case was reported in June, in Chesterfield county, and another, still later, in Lancaster county. The Chesterfield man got a bale of cotton, a keg of corn whisky, a pair boots and a dog for his wife, who, it was alleged, was perfectly willing to make the trade. The Lancaster man traded for another wife and a kerosene lamp, with a hand-painted porcelain shade "to boot." Two weeks later the other man came to him and offered him a dollar and a half, in cash, to trade back again, saying that the woman not only ate too much, but she stole the furniture and pawned it for whisky. These remarkable stories are vouched for by local papers still in my possession; and, strange to say, the people of that section seemed to have regarded these infamous transactions simply in the light of humorous affairs.

Leather Wall Paper.

New York Letter: I wonder if our fashionable "wall paper" is hereafter to be of leather? A part of William K. Vanderbilt's walls are hung with leather, as is one room of Henry Villard's new mansion. The walls of Victor Hugo's drawing room, where I attended a reception in June, are hung with leather heavier than sole leather. It may have been tanned tiger skins, or the bark of a drove of young elephants. It was not arranged smoothly on the wall, but hung at will, in loose folds and heavy corrugations, as if it grew there and had just peeled off. I did not inquire, but very likely it represented the tanned trophies sent to the venerable poet by his admirers hunting in India and Africa. To return to the Chicago home I was speaking of. The library, also used as a parlor, opens off the hall in front. Directly opposite the door is a mantelpiece of purple dark-stained cherry, with glass tile facings and a sconce. The walls are treated a few shades darker than the woodwork, so as to be a good background for pictures. The ceiling is a delicate blue, with an intricate stenciling of silver and kindred tints running over it. Immediately back of this is the dining-room, in mahogany and olive. The walls are similarly treated, and the chimneypiece and the buffet are the features of the apartment. This is not the largest house in Chicago, nor the most expensive, by considerable, but I suppose it is really the most artistic.

Harem Horrors.

Cleveland Leader: It would take many more pages to tell you all of that eventful night. I have seen much of Egyptian harem life aside from it. I visited a rich harem with a school teacher who has access to these homes. We passed through court after court, attended by two eunuchs; and several Nubian girls stood here and there in white loose robes, low-necked, covered with jewels (slaves they are—all are subject to the master); finally through a lofty garden with flowers and fountains. We entered a large salon with gay divans, and on the lovely Turkish rugs sat seven women, some smoking, some lolling, all on the floor, and as many more standing ready to do their bidding. They were the wives of two rich brothers. Some were young, some were old. One pretty little wife, only fourteen years old, had one child six months old. She had a chance to say a word to the teacher some weeks ago and told her she remembered when some men took her from her mother in Caucasia, about three years ago. She has been sold twice since. She said the old wives beat her sometimes, when they see the husband show any affection toward her. She is so sad; was covered with jewels and attire. They can't put their heads out of doors after marriage until after the birth of a child; it is a disgrace to do so. What a life is this harem!

Gres.

At this juncture, when every one is desirous of securing something different from what any one has seen before, something has made its appearance under the name of "Gres." It is purely decorative, and is made of natural clays, manipulated by hand and subject to intense heat, which hardens, brings out colors and glazed and metallic effects by the action of heat upon the chemical elements contained in the earths. Every piece produced is to a certain extent an experiment, no fixed laws having been discovered by which the exact appearance of the object when fired can be determined; but there is beauty of form, an exquisite finish and great delicacy in the designs, usually in relief, executed in the clay. It is hard to believe that no paint nor any metallic substance is used in the admirable color decoration, which is pure and harmonious though brilliant and unobtrusive. But it is known that these tints and that the gold and color and glaze effects are simply the development of fire and the combination of inherent qualities. There is great strength and true refinement in this pottery, which is a French product, and no better test can be furnished of its quality than to look at some pretty porcelain, after a visit to the Haviland exhibit in Barclay street.

A Combination.

A very elegant toilet recently worn by a noted prima donna in New York was made of black Lyons velvet, over a tea-rose satin petticoat trimmed with point applique lace ruffles. The train and Pompadour-cut bodice were perfectly plain. A fall of black lace answered in place of sleeves, and upon the left shoulder was fastened a drooping cluster of unmounted tea roses. A huge branch of these roses held the drapery of the velvet train low on the right side. Long Mousquetaire gloves of a pale pink shade, black satin slippers, over stockings of a pink to match completed the costume. The combination of black velvet and pink was very lovely, but flowers up in a velvet dress are never quite "good form," or a natural or appropriate garniture.

Jockey Caps.

The jockey cap seems to have taken a new lease of life, and is especially popular in the skating world. Many young ladies do not wear the cap on the head after the manner of the natty equestrians from whom they originated, but wear it rather far back on the head; consequently the little poke, instead of shading the eyes, curves upward and allows the Langtry bang or fluffy confusion of wavy hair to be seen. A flat wing is set on one side, and the cap is much less obtrusive than its name would imply.

Household Hints.

Handsome covers for sofa pillows and cushions are knitted in silk pieces. The foundation for the stripe—for it is made in stripes—is knit of common yarn, and is done with medium-sized needles; knit three and then draw through each loop on the needle a bit of silk. The silk must be cut in narrow strips of equal length and width. The yarn must be drawn firmly down to hold the silk in places. Old and even soiled ribbons may be used in this way.

A beautiful tidy for the back of a large chair is made of a square piece of cloth, about [illegible] inches each way; on which is sewed patchwork of plush and velvet in the form of a wide-spread fan. The corners of the cloth are of black velvet, and on the top, drooping over the fan, is a spray from a moss rose bush, in ribbon embroidery. The edge is finished with lace. The design is pretty in block in a quilt or sofa pillow.

The most fashionable pin-cushions at the present time, says the Queen, are either plain or embroidered satin, bordered with cord. Velvet is also employed, embroidered in silk or gold, and edged with ribbon ruched, and sometimes these cushions are quilted and then bordered with a ruche. A pretty one is made of gold-colored satin, with three rows of Valenciennes lace inserted in, and a gathering of the same lace beyond.

Dainty little sachet bags, made of ribbon with a piece of hand-painted bolting cloth over one side of each, are intended to be sent as Christmas cards. Small banners are made of wide handsome ribbon, fringed at the bottom, with the same bolting cloth laid over the silk and decorated with some choice design in water colors. A leaf of thick white paper is fastened between the two thicknesses of ribbon, upon which may be painted or written a Christmas greeting.

Lovely little aprons for those who wait upon table at church sociables or fairs, are made of pink or blue silesia, and are trimmed with white lace; they are in shape plain little bib aprons, with a pleating about five inches wide across the bottom; dainty white ones are made with strips of lace insertion down the seams and with no pleating but a lace across the bottom and up the sides.

Articles of a delicate blue that must be washed are often ruined by the process. This may be avoided by adding an ounce of sugar of lead to a pailful of water and letting the article lie in this for an hour and a half or for two hours; let it dry then, after which it may be washed without injury. This is said to be a perfect remedy for the trouble referred to.

Very pretty curtains, which can be laundered and look as well as new ones, are made of white muslin with large round dots the size of a silver half dollar. Loop them back with a plain band of ribbon. These are pretty for bedrooms or for the common sitting room. They look well with no other edge than a hem.

Salt and sugar jars and common flower pots are now ornamented in the most artistic manner with raised flowers of putty only. These are molded in the hand and fixed on and then tinted; they last as well as those that are burnt, if care is used in the selection and coloring of the flowers.

Handsome paper holders for the wall are made of large Japanese basket covers, gilded, and bronzed, with a fancy plush or silk pocket fastened on one side.

A little borax put in the water in which scarlet napkins and red-bordered towels are to be washed will prevent them fading.

Plumage.

Crimson stockings are now more worn than black ones. Those made of silk and very fine thread are fashionable for dress occasions.

Veils are worn short, barely reaching below the eyes, and are omitted altogether by those whose complexions do not need protection.

Sleeveless bodices will not be worn this winter. Small sleeves will be worn, and the gloves, in every instance, will meet the lace.

Paris affects English fashions just at present, and there is a return of favor to clinging draperies.

Parisian dressmakers discard all, also, the tight-fitting coat-sleeve for street costumes.

Waistcoats of all kinds, [illegible] bodices of the corsage are greatly in vogue.

It is again fashionable to wear a small pin in the folds of the bonnet strings.

Laced shoes made with broad heels and [illegible] are coming in vogue.

Black velvet bonnets tied with narrow [illegible]

A letter from Portland Oregon, says: December there was like April and May in Minnesota, and Dakota. Plenty of rain but mild temrerature.

Building returns from nearly every large place in the country show more extensive operations than in 1882; but the indications from the price and supply of building material are that the boom in building is over and its effects on wages and all forms of building supplies must be immediate and lasting. Lumber, nails, glass, labor, and in fact, everything will rule cheaper this year than the last.

Nashville, Tenn., is enjoying great prosperity. The amount expended for buildings exceeds any previous year, and new manufacturing establishments are constantly started and all are filled with orders. No business failure of any consequence has occurred in Nashville during the year. The trade, both wholesale and retail, has been better than usual, and collections in some instances are unusually good.

Sergeant Mason has been offered by several parties the sum of $5,000 a year to draw trade, appear in a show, etc. He says he will wait until March to think the matter over, but it is suggested that he had better "take time by the four o'clock," as the first of March may find him without special attractions to the public. In other words he will be superseded by some "Jumbo" or another, and be of no account whatever as an advertising medium.

On motion of Mr. Reed, of Maine, the House has complacently agreed to raise a special committee to investigate the traffic in alcoholic liquors. Mr. Reed's committee will also inquire into the question whether it is in the power of Congress to pass laws for the restraint and prohibition of the liquor traffic in the United States. This is an interesting question, and when it gets into national politics there will be "music in the air."

The great fall in stocks, especially the Villards—within a few months may be seen by a few figures. In August, when the last spike was driven Northern Pacific preferred stood at 88, and common at 49. A few days ago they were 55 1-2 and 25 3-4, from which facts it is plain that somebody has heard a drop. On the 5th of August last Oregon Trans-continental was quoted at 77; a day or two ago 37 3-4—here, also, a drop. The Manitoba was at 160 last summer, now it is less than 100.

Mr. D. C. Robbins of the New York Chamber of Commerce, advocates the punishment of bankrupts whenever it appears that they have been engaged in illegitimate "outside" speculation. It is outside speculation all that at the bottom of a large percentage of the recent failures, but it is doubtful whether a remedy can be found in a legal enactment. Misrepresentation, obtaining goods under false pretenses, is about as far as the law can go in the direction of prevention.

An interesting illustration of how centers of trade shifted by means of new railways is furnished in a press dispatch from San Francisco. Four months ago three steamers a week could not carry all the freight offered in San Francisco for Oregon and Washington Territory, while now one steamer every five days is sufficient. The Northern Pacific is taking goods direct from the East to Oregon and Washington Territory, which formerly went by water to San Francisco and by water also from there to their destination in the Northwest. The Northwestern trade of San Francisco is said to have fallen off seventy-five per cent. since the Northern Pacific was opened.

The coal-miners of Pennsylvania have added a new feature to the agitation in regard to the "protecting of American labor." They want Hungarian laborers expelled from that region on the ground that they are filthy, immoral, ignorant, unscrupulous, and simply intend to remain long enough in America to make a few dollars and then depart, for their native land. The true reason is, that the Hungarians work cheaper and live cheaper and therefore, like the Chinese, "They must go." That the government possesses the right to exclude what are deemed improper persons of any nation, is conceded by statesman generally. But whether cheap foreigners can be excluded to protect American labor is another question.

Death of a Prominent Buckeye.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 28.—Gen. Thomas L. Kane, one of the most prominent citizens of this State, died at his residence in this city this morning of pneumonia.

Gen. Kane lived in Philadelphia after leaving the army, which he did by resignation of his commission as brigadier general in November, 1863. He was first known to fame as a brother of the famous Arctic explorer, Dr. Kane, and latter as commanding the Pennsylvania Bucktails, a regiment which in 1862-63 did effective service in the campaigns in Virginia and Maryland.

As was stated a day or two ago, the Milwaukee & St. Paul will shortly abandon its pay cars, and adopt the check system of paying off. This system was adopted on the company's lines in Wisconsin a short time ago, and has proved so successful that it will be introduced in Iowa, Illinois, Minnesota and Dakota. The checks will be cashed at a certain banking house in the states and territory mentioned. About 28,000 checks will be required monthly to pay the company's employes. A check is being prepared by the National Bank Note company for the purpose.

General News Gossip.

Duluth Tribune: The petition of the C. N. Nelson Lumber company and the Knife Falls Lumber company for the incorporation of the village of Cloquet, Carleton county, and the annexation of the island known as the town of Dunlap, was heard before Judge Stearns recently. It seems that the town of Colquet does not allow the sale of liquor in its limits, and that in Dunlap are located a great many saloons, in opposition to the sentiment of the good people of the former place, and it is their object to secure the annexation of the island and do away with the traffic.

The report of the Mississippi river commission gives a resume of the year's work, the larger portion of which was devoted to improvements at Plum Point and Lake Providence. Various surveys have been made for other improvements, and the commission makes several recommendations and suggestions for the consideration of congress.

Vincennes (Ind.) Special: Sunday morning between the hours of 1 and 2 o'clock, from fifty to seventy-five men surrounded the jail in Petersburg, Pike county, Ind., in which was confined young Charlie Harvey, the murderer of Henry Custin, Jr. The front door, was broken and unfastened and a guard stationed near it was quickly overpowered. The jailer was in bed, and the leaders of the mob crowded into his room and demanded the keys of the jail doors. These he gave up at once, seeing that it was useless to attempt resistance. The mob marched with the keys to the cell where Harvey was confined. As soon as he heard the noise he was struck dumb with terror. Grabbing hold of him the mob placed a rope around his neck, pinioned his arms and bade him walk ahead. They hurried the doomed man to the edge of the town, and arriving at a locust tree proceeded to hang him up. After hanging them they placed a card in his hand bearing the words, "more to follow." The members of the mob are unknown. Harvey was twenty-one years of age and very respectably connected. He had always bore a bard reputation, however, and confessed to a robbery committed last Thursday night.

A PLEASANT FICTION.

Of Which a Pittsburgh Coal Miner is the Hero.

From San Antonio, Tex., Express.

A reporter of the Express learned from a Mr. James Hold, of Concho, the particulars of a history that if properly handled would make the web and woof of as romantic a novel as was ever written. It is the story of a beautiful young lady who voluntarily leaves all the luxuries and elegances of a beautiful home in Philadelphia, to follow a lover to the wilds of Texas. Blanche Thomas was the only daughter of wealthy and fond parents, who lavished upon her all that wealth could purchase. A graduate of a celebrated seminary, naturally bright and vivacious, and with a beauty matchless in its loveliness, she became without an effort a society belle. Her dresses from Worth, her equipages, her brown-stone house on Chestnut street, were the envy of many and the ambition of a few. Her father took her with him to Paris, where she became the rage in the American colony there, and her toilets were described at length in La Minerva Figaro. Many admirers had aspired to her hand—many wealthy noblemen had offered themselves in marriage, but in vain. She was the theme of conversation alike in salon and the cafe, and while admired for her many charms, she was considered cold and heartless.

Her parents at last became vexed at her continued refusal of such splendid offers and did all in their power to make her marry a wealthy English baronet, but without avail. When pressed by her father for an explanation of her strange conduct, she reluctantly acknowledged she was in love, and had been since her childhood, with the son of the manager of her father's coal mines in Pittsburg. This so enraged her father that he forbade her even to mention the young man's name again, and unthinkingly told her she must select some eligible party within six months, or cease to be his daughter. Thinking him to be in earnest, and knowing him to be a man of his word, the poor girl packed up a few clothes, and taking what money she had in her purse at the time, took passage on an outward bound steamer for New York. Arriving there she telegraphed to her lover in Pittsburg, who did not even stop to change his mining clothes, so afraid was he that he would miss the fast train that was to carry him to the object of his affections.

There was a quiet little marriage at Grace church the next day, and the spoiled child of fortune was the wife of a brawny muscular miner.

But the question now arose, what were they to do? for she had no money, and what little he had would not last long, as he had sacrificed his position in the mines when marrying her. After much thought and a great amount of planning it was decided to come to Texas and here build for themselves a home. He pre-empted and purchased land and sheep in Taylor county, built a house of two small rooms, and while she cooked, washed and attended to the humble avocation of household drudgery he looked after the sheep and cultivated a few acres of land. No thoughts of past splendor came to disturb her calm tranquility and perfect happiness, but every day seemed to be fuller of pleasure than the last, and their happiness was as deep and eternal as the occult skies above. Their very isolation brought them closer together and strengthened a love that was as pure as it was eternal.

A year of perfect but quiet happiness passed by, when the husband broke his leg, and the work of watching the sheep devolved upon his wife. Nursing her sick husband and looking after the out-door department took up most of her time. But one afternoon as she was walking toward the house in her simple country dress, a party of gentlemen rode up, and one of them was her father, who had been searching for his daughter since her departure from Paris. Hearing of her marriage in New York, he bitterly repented his hasty words, and had followed her to Texas. Calm reflection had taught him that hers had, after all, been the better choice, and he was only too glad to recognize in her husband a son-in-law. He persuaded them to give up their home in Texas for a time and return with him to Philadelphia.

Praise for the Soldiers.

From the Cincinnati Commercial.

Concerning the controversy that has arisen over the battle of Shiloh, it may be briefly said that if our generals expected an attack, they were not surprised when it came, their forces were amazingly arranged to receive it. If it was a surprise, as some contend, the troops considering their position, made a splendid resistance, and were by no means whipped, though many were badly demoralized when Buell's army came up. In either case it was more a soldiers' battle on our side, than a manifestation of any genius for generalship.

A Big Failure in Providence.

The firm of A. D. Smith & Co., of Providence, have made an assignment. Liabilities over $1,000,000, largely to the Providence banks. The firm operated two cotton mills in that city, two in Johnstown, and one in Woonsocket, in all 87,000 spindles. The failure involves the suspension of the Providence Steam Mill company, the Groton Manufacturing company, and the Franklin Manufacturing company. The total indebtedness of the firm is about $1,700,000.

A partial and official list of the paper held in banks at Providence awards $185,000 to the National Bank of Commerce, $150,000 to the People's Savings bank (secured), $175,000 to the American National bank, $75,000 to the Merchants National bank. No compromise will be sought, but the property will be sold and the proceeds divided among the creditors.

The firm of Amos D. Smith & Co. is one of long standing, and is one of the best known manufacturing concerns in the East. The junior members are of the Rhode Island family of Smiths, though not of Amos D. Smith's immediate household. The late James Y. Smith, who was at one time governor of the state, and himself a prominent manufacturer, was a brother of the latter.

A Deadly Feud.

BOSTON, Dec. 28.—Daniel P. Reynolds of New York called at the house of James Budd of Dorcester, this State, and was ushered into the parlor, where Budd joined him. A servant, who passed by the parlor, heard Reynolds say: "I have come for either your life or property." An altercation ensued, when Budd started to run up stairs, presumably for a weapon, and Reynolds fired twice, the shots taking effect, one in the leg, and the other in the small of the back. The latter shot is believed to be fatal. Neither Reynolds nor Budd's family will explain the differences between the men, but it is understood, however, the shooting was the result of a long standing feud, arising from family and property complications. Budd is a prominent resident of Dorcester. He is a director of and largely interested in the Veneer glass works of this city. Reynolds says he shot Budd because he persecuted his wife and mother-in-law, Mrs. Dries. The latter lived with Budd as a mistress, while Budd's real wife is in an inebriate asylum.

Death of a Catholic Archbishop.

Archbishop Perche of Louisiana died at New Orleans, on the 26th. The funeral will take place Jan. 2. All the archbishops of the province will be present. Archbishop Napoleon J. Perche was about seventy-five years of age. He was consecrated bishop of Gbdera in partibus infidelium, and coadjutor on May 1, 1870. On the 25th of the same month he became archbishop of New Orleans. The first news of his illness was sent out on Christmas day, when he was reported dying.

LAST YEARS EVENTS.

The Loss of Human Life by Earthquake, Fire, Flood and Accident
Last Year.

Crimes Increase in Numbers and Variety—A Year's Sport in the United States—
Dramatic Events.

The history of a year is something that the best memory, or even the best newspaper, cannot present unimpeachably correct. Only the salient events of the 365 days can ever be carried in the mind, and it is of these that the impression of the year 1883 must be made. There is a special value in studying even the dryest presentation of the year's events as a matter of practical every-day history. Its convenience appears in a thousand ways as time goes on and greater or lesser events fix themselves in the memory of their relation to other occurrences. A review of the events of 1883, gleaned from a review of newspaper files, appears below. It shows that the year was one of the most remarkable in history in the great number of catastrophes by which many lives were lost. The fatality of the world, approximately estimated from the reported deaths, cannot be far from 100,000. The list of deaths includes a larger than usual proportion of great persons. A full catalogue of the homicides and miscellaneous crimes that have taken place in the United States would surprise the public with the information that vice is rapidly on the increase. In other respects the events of the year are decidedly noteworthy.

DISASTERS.

Few years have witnessed so many great catastrophes. Jan. 10 the Newhall house burned in Wisconsin at 4 o'clock in the morning, and 75 guests and servants lost their lives. The pecuniary loss was $500,000. Four days later the Planters' house, St. Louis, burned, causing four deaths, and the circus in Berditscheff, Russia, burned during a performance, and 268 persons perished. In January, also, 18 convicts were drowned crossing Tukaseegee river, North Carolina; the British ship Empire burned on the way to Bombay, and 16 were lost; a Bethlehem, Pa., boiler explosion killed 5; the Cimbria sunk in collision with the Sultan in the German ocean, drowning 434 persons; a Southern Pacific train went over an embankment at Tehachopa, Cala., and 20 were killed; 6 men were lost from the schooner Garfield in a storm near Halifax; 72 were drowned by the flooding of a mine in Austria; 10 lives were lost by the sinking of the City of Brussells; at Centerville, Ill., a mine exploded and ten men were killed; in February the frightful disaster at Braidwood, Ill., occurred, by which 63 men were buried in the Diamond mine, and their bodies were not recovered for several months. In a panic in the Fourth Street school, New York city, 16 children lost their lives. By various floods in Ohio, Missouri and other neighboring States 56 lives were lost. The schooner Pilot Bride went down off Desolation island and all the crew but four drowned. The Ashuelot sank off Hong Kong, drowning 11. In March the steamer Navarre went down with 65 men on board. In April a boiler explosion at St. Dezier, Paris, killed sixty-five. On the 25th of the same month 127 miners were killed in Eastern France. In May the Brooklyn bridge panic cost fourteen lives, the steamboat Pilot blew up at San Francisco, killing eight, and tornadoes are estimated to have killed over 100. On June 16 occurred the frightful panic in Sunderland Exhibition hall, in which 202 children were trampled to death. Floods and tornadoes caused fifty-eight deaths in this month. June 25 twenty-five Chinamen were killed in a mine beyond the Mullan tunnel, Montana. July 2 seven lives were lost in a railroad accident at Bradford, Pa. On the 4th the Daphne, in being launched at Glasgow, careened and drowned 150. A fire in Hungary burned twenty. July 24 Tivoli pier fell near Baltimore, drowning seventy-two. At Carlyon, N. Y., seventeen were killed, among them Thomas Hoyne of Chicago. Capt. Webb was killed the last of this month while trying to swim the Niagara whirlpool. Floods at London, Ont., drowned seventeen. The month closed with the volcanic eruption at Ischia, off the Bay of Naples, in which the loss of life was beyond estimation. The Cologne Gazette puts it at 8,000, while others think not over 5,000 lost their lives there. On the 23d of August occurred the Rochester cyclone, in which the total loss of life was twenty-three. The steamer Riverdale burst her boilers on the Hudson river and a number of lives were lost. Aug. 30 came the Java earthquake, a catastrophe terrible beyond anything known in the history of the world. Probably 75,000 people were killed by it. The ravages of the cholera in India and Egypt during the summer caused a horrible loss of life, over 12,000 people dying in July, and 10,000 being reported in Egypt alone during August. Deaths by yellow fever in Mexico, the West Indies, and the United States probably reach the number of 3,000. In September nine soldiers of Illinois militia were killed at Springfield. On the 29th, a powdermill in San Francisco exploded and killed forty-one, mostly Chinese. Nov. 8, the new wing of the capitol at Madison, Wis., fell, burying twenty men. One was killed, and others seriously hurt. The steamer Manistee went down on Lake Superior about the 21st, with, it is estimated, fifty persons on board. In the same storm probably seventy-five sailors perished on the lakes. In December three Gloucester schooners went down with thirty-eight on board. The sinking of the schooner Mary Ann Hurlburt in Lake Superior on the 14th caused the death of fifteen men. On the 16th the Spanish steamer St. Augustine burned in the Bay of Biscay, and upward of thirty lives were lost. On the 17th a terrific storm occurred on the Black sea, in which it is estimated that 300 perished. In the burning of the German Israelite school at Constantinople thirty were burned to death. A snowslide in Colorado killed eight men last week. The steamer Plantyn, bound for Antwerp from New York, was foundered and five sailors were killed last week.

NECROLOGY.

The year began with a notable death at Washington—Elisha Allen, the Hawaiian minister and dean of the diplomatic corps, while making a New Year's call at the White House. On the same day Leon Gambetta died near Paris in his forty-fourth year, from a pistol wound, said to have been inflicted by his mistress, Madame Leon, but now believed to have been by his own accident. The same day also the earl of Stamford died in England, aged fifty-four. Other notable deaths in January were those of Barrett, the jockey who rode Parole; William A. Seaver, assistant editor of Harper's Magazine; Lot M. Morrill of Maine; Dr. Samuel A. Mudd, near Bryantown, Md., after his release from the Dry Tortugas for participation in the assassination of President Lincoln; ex-Congressman Fort of Illinois; Bishop Cruikshank of Indianapolis, age sixty-seven; Henry Kip, vice-president United States Express company; Jerome F. Fargo, one of the express family, at Buffalo, N. Y.; Prince Alexander, brother of Emperor William; Wolfgang Goethe, son of the great German poet; Gustave Dore, the artist; Lord Greville of England. In February, ex-Gov. E. D. Morgan of New York died; Richard Wagner, the composer; Marshall Jewell, the ex-postmaster general and chairman of the Republican national committee; ex-Gov. Davis of Texas; Dr. Paul Chadbourne of Massachusetts, in New York city; and Charles R. Thorne, the actor, at New York. The first noted death in March was that of Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia, on the 4th of the month. Other noted deaths were Col. Harry Gilmour, the rebel guerrilla, at Baltimore; Prince Gortschakoff, ex-chancellor of the Russian empire, at Baden-Baden; T. O. Howe, postmaster general; J. R. Green, the English historian, at Mentone; Karl Marx, aged sixty five, at Argenteuil; and John Brown, Queen Victoria's body servant. The first notable death in April was that of Peter Cooper, the philanthropist, in New York city, in his ninety-third year. Other deaths were Surgeon General Barnes, Franz II., grand duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin; in Constantinople, Sulieman Pasha. In May President Grant's mother died at Jersey City, in her eighty-fourth year; Israel Washburn died in Philadelphia; Bishop Peck, at Syracuse; William Chambers, the publisher, in London; Edouard Laboulaye, in Paris; and Abd-el-Kader, in Damascus. In June, Charles C. Fulton, editor of the Baltimore American, died. Prof. Anthon, the classical scholar, died in New York; and ex-Congressman Casserly in California. In August Wirt Sykes, consul at Cardiff, died; also, Judge Black, at York, Pa.; Count de Chambord, at Frohsdorf. In September, Hugh Hastings, of the New York Commercial Advertiser, died; and Junius Brutus Booth, at Manchester, Mass. In October, Gen. Steedman, the war hero, died at Toledo. In November, Natt Head, ex-governor of New Hampshire, and Admiral Creighton, died.

POLITICAL.

The identification of President Arthur's administration with the reform of the civil service took shape in February and March. Senator Pendleton's bill was passed Jan. 4; early in March the president appointed Dorman B. Eaton of New York, John M. Gregory of Illinois, and L. D. Thoman of Ohio, civil service commissioners. March 3, Senator David Davis retired from the vice presidency, and Senator Edmunds elected to succeed him. March 4 congress adjourned. John W. Foster was sent as minister to Spain. Thomas W. Palmer of Detroit was elected to the Senate. April 3 Walter Q. Gresham was appointed postmaster general to succeed T. O. Howe, deceased. May 21 Walter Evans was appointed commissioner of internal revenue to succeed Green B. Raum. In August President Arthur came West, going by way of the Union Pacific to the Yellowstone park. Dec. 1, the Forty-eighth congress met and J. G. Carlisle of Kentucky was elected speaker. On the 12th the Republican national committee met at Washington and elected Senator Sabin chairman, to succeed Marshall Jewell, deceased, and Chicago was selected for the next national convention.

In the States several notable changes have taken place. Jan. 4, Gov. Butler was inaugurated at Boston. James S. Boynton was sworn in as governor of Georgia, to succeed Alexander H. Stephens, deceased. April 12, H. D. McDaniel was nominated for governor, and on the 24th was elected, to succeed Boynton. May 17, Proctor Knott was nominated for governor of Kentucky, and later was elected. Nov. 6 Judge Hoadly, Democrat, was elected governor of Ohio; Buren R. Sherman, Republican, of Iowa; George D. Robinson, Republican, of Massachusetts; Robert McLane, Democrat, of Maryland; Leon Abbett, Democrat, of New Jersey; and L. F. Hubbard, Republican, of Minnesota.

DRAMATIC.

In the dramatic world the year has been more or less memorable. Mrs Langtry made her first appearance in the West at Chicago, on January 1. After an extended tour through the country, in which she experienced all the incidents attendant on a theatrical scandal, she sailed home July 24. Her earnings are said to have been nearly $200,000 in this country. In October Henry Irving and Ellen Terry landed in New York and the former appeared the following week in The Bells, receiving a welcome from people and press such as belonged to England's greatest actor. Mary Anderson went to London in October, and has played steadily at the Lyceum. Mapleson and Abbey have brought large and high-priced operatic performers from Europe, including Patti, Gerster and Sembrich, and have been playing in fierce rivalry at the Metropolitan and the Academy of Music in New York.

SPORTING.

Jan. 6, in a billiard match, cushion caroms, at New York, Maurice Daly defeated William Sexton; average: Daly, 4 8-23; Sexton, 4 11-114. The wrestling match on the 13th, at Louisville, Ky., between John Graham and Clarence Whistler, best two out of three falls, Græco-Roman and catch-as-catch-can, was won by Graham. In the Græco-Roman wrestling match, the 27th, for $500 and championship, at St. Louis, between Muldoon and Bauer, the former won. Feb. 4 Muldoon downed Bibby in a wrestling match at St. Louis. On the 23d Carver beat Bogardus at Louisville; score, 83 to 82. March 12 the National league and American Base Ball associations made up their differences. The Chicago billiard tournament opened on the 26th with a victory for Vignaux over Daly. April 5 Shaefer beats the best record at billiards, at Chicago. May 14, Sullivan knocked out Mitchell in three rounds in New York. July 28, the Pullman regatta opened at Pullman, Ill. August 6, Sullivan, in a glove fight at the Madison Square Garden, New York city, knocked out Herbert A. Slade in two and a-half rounds. On the 13th William Ryan, John Morrissey's trainer in his early days, died at Fort Edward. Boston won the league championship; the Athletic, of Philadelphia, the American; and the Toledo nine the Northwestern championship.

NORTHWESTERN EVENTS.

The year has been especially eventful in the Northwest. In Minnesota Senator Windom was defeated for re-election, and D. M. Sabin elected on the twenty-ninth ballot, Feb. 2. The capital of Dakota, after a long and arduous struggle, was removed to Bismarck by Gov. Ordway and the capital commission chosen through his instrumentality. The Northern Pacific road was completed and formally opened Sept. 8. St. Paul and Minneapolis, on Sept. 3, celebrated this event with a magnificence and enthusiasm never before shown in the two cities. President Villard, accompanied by numerous guests, among whom were Gen. Grant and ex-Secretaries Evarts and Schurz, was accorded a grand ovation, ending with a banquet given by the city of St. Paul at the Lafayette hotel, Lake Minnetonka. The last spike was driven Sept. 8, at a point sixty miles west of Helena, with appropriate and elaborate ceremonies. The Yellowstone park was this year opened to the public by railroad, and Rufus Hatch, with a special train bearing a large number of invited guests, spent a fortnight there. The Canadian Pacific was pushed on to the Rocky mountains. Rich discoveries of gold in the Cœur d'Alene mines have stimulated crowded emigration thither. The crops throughout Minnesota and Dakota were generally good. Early frosts damaged wheat in some parts of the Red River valley. The improvement of the mineral region north of Duluth was begun in the building of the Iron Range railroad, which is to tap that hitherto unknown section of the State. One of the important events is the completion of the Manitoba railroad viaduct at Minneapolis, the first stone bridge across the Mississippi.

CRIME.

One of the most blood-curdling crimes of the past year was the killing of Richard Pierce of St. Paul the night of Jan. 1. Great excitement was caused by the affair, which was only allayed by the discovery of the supposed dead man in the pineries and his return home. The number of murders in the United States is probably larger for 1883 than any preceding year. Only two celebrated crimes can be mentioned. June 8 Armistead Barksdale killed his cousin, Scott Clayton, at Lawrenceburg, Va., and a few days later committed suicide in remorse. March 1, Jimmie Elliott, the pugilist, was shot and killed in Chicago by Jere Dunn, a notorious sporting man. March 8, George Conkling shot and killed W. H. Haverstick, his sister's paramour in New York; Conkling was let off on bail and is living in Nevada. At Harrodsburg, Ky., April 27, Congressman Phil Thompson shot and killed instantly Walter H. Davis, whom he charged with seducing his wife. Thompson was acquitted. April 24, a mob at Devil's Lake killed the two Ward brothers. At Uniontown, Pa., June 13, James Nutt killed Dukes who murdered his father, Capt. Nutt, in an altercation over a slander against Miss Lizzie Nutt. Young Nutt's trial is pending in Pittsburg. Sept. 3, the body of Rose Ambler Clark was found at Stamford, Conn. The murderer escaped. On the 25th of the same month, Ada Atkinson was brutally murdered by Nelling at Oxford, Ind. Nelling was subsequently lynched.

Other notable crimes were the robbery of the City bank, New York, of $18,000 by Cashier Shaw and Assistant Cashier Beach; the abduction of Zerelda Garrison at St. Louis; the robbery at Panama of $15,000 sent by the government to the United States fleet in the Pacific; O. B. Owen's stealing $200,000 from the St. Louis bank; the robbery of $20,000 in diamonds at Springfield, Ill.; the assault on Lady Florence Dixie in the grounds at Windsor; robbery of the United States express company of $15,000 at Des Moines; murder of two men in the posse that captured the Barber brothers in Iowa; the defalcation of Treasurer Polk of Tennessee to the amount of $100,000; the murder of Brandy by his wife and her paramour at Argyle, Minn.; the embezzlement of Phipps, the Philadelphia alms house keeper; the robbery of Secretary Teller's trunks, containing $3,000 of diamonds, at Livingston, Mont. The murder of seven negroes at Danville, Va., on election day, and the shooting of several persons at Yazoo, Miss., Christmas, resulting in the lynching last night of four negroes at that place.

The following order has been issued by the navy department: Women shall not be allowed to reside on board vessels of the United States navy in commission for sea service; nor shall they be taken as passengers on such vessels under any circumstances.

The Scientific American explains the process of making paper gas-pipes, and we don't know but an insult to the press could be picked out of the idea.

A prize fight between two women for $10 a side was a recent novelty in Austin, Texas.

Nelson and Arthur Patterson were severely injured by a railroad collision at Anoka.

Organized.

THE FARMERS AND BUSINESS MEN OF POLK COUNTY MEET AND PERFECT AN ORGANIZATION.

A Large and Enthusiastic Meeting of Men who know their rights and Knowing dare Maintain.

THE FIRST GUN FOR VICTORY.

On Saturday last there gathered at Ericsson's Hall an assemblage of earnest men which will be memorable in the history of this county as a most remarkable event; remarkable not only in the necessity which calls for the expression but in the size and character of the assemblage. In every year, in every market in the world there will always be found more or less grumbling by men who are oppressed by one thing or another, generally confined among a few either too shiftless to be able to meet their obligations or else from some other inherent cause everlastingly dissatisfied. But seldom, in the history of any country does such a class of solid business men meet to discuss one common topic of such mighty import but when they do there is evidently some cause of disquiet that needs attention, that should be and must be remedied. The hall was well filled at two o'clock and the numbers kept increasing until "standing room only" could well have been posted outside. The significance of the meeting lies in the fact that fully two-thirds of the audience were farmers, from all over the county, many of them venerable old men whose hoary locks are frosting with age, all earnest, determined to look the question squarely in the face and apply the remedy as far as possible. Mr. M. B. Brown was elected chairman, and Mr. H. E. Cooke, secretary. In a few timely remarks the chairman outlined the situation and stated the object of the meeting was to consult upon the most practical means for obtaining relief, and inviting a free and general discussion. Mr. A. Allen being called stated that he saw the point and felt it and what he wanted to see was the relief applied; had come in to this meeting to listen to suggestions. Mr. Chase thought the importance and gravity of the question called for due deliberation, reviewed the situation briefly and suggested the appointment of a committee of three or five to draw up a plan of action upon which all could unite. Mr E. D. Childs said he feels a deep interest in this question as it affected the vital interests of this country and a change is imperatively demanded; said the system of grading was at fault and caused all of the distress; dwelt at length upon the situation with the conclusion that the only true, permanent relief that could be afforded was by way of a railroad to Duluth. Suggested the appointment of a committee to confer with the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad company to ascertain whether an offer of a bonus from each town along the line of road would be any inducement for the company to resume work at an early day. Mr. H. E. Cooke stated that he had given the subject much thought and attention and considered the plan of sending our wheat to an eastern market by an all rail route impracticable, when the great water route, via Duluth and the great lakes was almost at our very doors, and calculated in the very nature of the case to work great wrong to the producer. The Minneapolis Millers, by their present absolute control of the wheat market forced it out of its natural channel and hence arose no small item in the list of grievances. What we want is some practicable plan by which relief can be obtained in time for the next crop; had considered well every remedy that has yet been offered and sees that the St. Paul & Manitoba railroad company, by their line to Duluth could give us all we need if they will consent to ship our wheat to Duluth and also consent to give us an open market by allowing any one to ship where and when he chose; would therefore recommend that a committee be appointed to confer with Messrs. Hill and Manvel, stating the case as it exists and ascertaining the attitude of the railroad toward the people before proceeding to try other resources. Mr. Moore made a stirring address and wanted to see something done for relief from the present intolerable system. Mr. Fifield recommended building a farmers' elevator as the best means for obtaining competition. Mr. J. F. Brown favored a farmers' railroad to Duluth as the most feasible thing to do, stating that the amount of money drained out of the country this fall would nearly build the entire line, and urged forcibly the necessity and entire practicability of building it at once. Mr. Sewell P. Norton thought that when No. 1 Hard Scotch Fife wheat changed into soft Blue Stem in going from Polk County to Minneapolis it was high time for some change in the program and would favor anything that would give it. The chairman thought a railroad to Duluth would be the proper thing to have; but really could not see how the efforts of the farmers to build it could be crystallized in time to do us any good for next crop even if at all. While he recognized the benefits of such a road, he could see many objections to the farmers being able to build one. He was decidedly in favor of building an elevator as he could see wherein some practicable relief could be had and dwelt upon the whys and wherefores at length. Mr. E. D. Childs said that the estimated cost of the road, from Duluth to Crookston was 37,000,000 and that doubtless an offer of a bonus to the D. & W. road, already in the field, would induce them to commence operations in time to reach us by next fall. Mr John N. Ives saw the importance of prompt action, this large meeting and the deep interest manifested shows that, and after a careful review of the situation said that he agreed with Mr. Cooke in the assertion that the railroad company holds the key to the situation, he would therefore suggest that a memorial be sent to Messrs. Hill and Manvel showing the effects of the present system of wheat buying upon the vital interests of the county, ascertaining their views and what could be expected by way of relief from the company. Moved that a committee of five be appointed to confer with the railroad company for the purpose aforesaid. Motion prevailed and the chairman appointed Jno. N. Ives, K. D. Chase, J. F. Brown, E. D. Childs and H. E. Cooke as such committee. Mr. Box moved that a committee of three, consisting of John N. Ives, E. D. Childs and J. F. Brown be appointed to confer with the D. & W. railroad company in the matter of a bonus. The motion prevailed. Mr. John N. Ives moved that the chair appointed a committee consisting of one in each town to ascertain the feeling in relation to the bonuses. The chair appointed:

Peter Cornelius,.................. Crookston.
John Amundson,.................... Fairfax.
Edward Lanctot,.................... Gentilly.
C. Kretschmar, Red Lake Falls, village.
G. Labissinuierre, Red Lake Falls, town.
John De Puge, ... Gervais.
Pierre Emard,.................... Emardsville.
John T. Beaudry,.......... Lake Pleasant.
Rock Lizee,........................ Terrebonne.
T. Munier,...................... Poplar River.

The secretary was instructed to notify the above parties requested them to call a meeting in their respective towns, ascertain what the feeling in relation to bonding and about how much each town will do, and submit a report at the next meeting, on Saturday, Jan. 12th, 1884. Mr. Childs moved that the secretary be instructed to cause to be published the official proceedings of this meeting and to send a marked copy to President J. J. Hill, and Gen'l Manager Manvel, of the Manitoba road, to His Excellency Gov L. F. Hubbard, Gen'l manager Hubbard, Millers Association, C. A. Pillsbury, W. H. Fisher, Chamber of Commerce Duluth, and to many others whose names shall be furnished. The chairman made a few remarks on farming suggesting that a committee be appointed to organize a farmers' club and be ready with rules and regulations, by laws etc., to be adopted at next meeting. Mr. Box thought that would be mixing things up too much, better attend to the matter in hand first. Mr. Marin made a rattling speech against the idea, ably supported by John N. Ives. Mr. M. E. Bartlett then moved that the chairman appoint a committee of seven whose duty it should be through its chairman to call a meeting for the purpose of forming a Farmers' Association of Polk Co. The motion prevailed and the chair appointed the following gentlemen as such committee:

M. E. Bartlett,........ Fairfax, Chairman.
C. W. Kimberly,.......................... Edna.
W. D. Carlton,.............................. Argus.
A. Sture,.............................. Black River
Louis Berthiaume,.................. Gentilly
H. Miller,...................................... Lowell.
W. G. Lytle,.............................. Andover

Mr. Childs moved that the sense of the meeting be taken by a rising vote upon the question of bonding towns which brought every man in the house to his feet with promptness and dispatch. On motion adjourned till Saturday, Jan. 13th at two o'clock p. m.

Attest:

M. B. BROWN, Chairman.
H. E. COOKE, Secretary.

Mr. Pillsbury asserts that the effect of the elevator system is not to exclude competition. He says that the elevators are public elevators and that anybody can buy through them, and he says that the elevator companies do not try to exclude any buyers from the market. Is that true? How do the facts justify Mr. Pillsbury's assertion? We have a case in point at Fergus Falls where a few days since the millers there decided to pay the farmers a trifle more than the elevators were paying. Directly an agent from the elevator companies or the Millers' Association, appeared and remonstrated with the millers of Fergus Falls. This did not have the desired effect and it is said that after using some strong threats the emissary departed and directly thereafter the elevators in the vicinity of Fergus Falls put wheat up 5 cents per bushel. How does that look? How can you reconcile their actions with what they say? It is said for Mr. Pillsbury that he is an "honorable" man in business as well as in private life, yet this Northwest has lost thousands of dollars on a false and unjust system of wheat buying. It is said that the Millers' Association is composed of "honorable" men, yet that association gets all of our No. 1 Hard Scotch Fife wheat at a difference of at least 22 cents per bushel between Minneapolis and here; they take that same wheat and make it worth as much more by mixing soft wheat with it to raise the grade of the flour to No. 1 Hard Minnesota spring wheat flour, they manage their affairs so that there is no possible avenue of escape for the wheat raiser, by depriving him of an open market, thus causing a loss to him of all of the profits of his labor. And yet these are all "upright and honorable" men! What a mercy it is that they are not THIEVES, but are "honorable" men, helping "to build up the country by their big investments!" If they were THIEVES now they might steal the sacks, and, if a farmer got off home with his clothes on, with his wagon and team he might consider himself lucky if they were THIEVES instead of "honorable" dealers. It matters not what you call them the system that allows the advantage they can take over the sellers is wrong, radically wrong and must be changed.

Mr. Pillsbury objects to the great agitation now going on in the Northwest saying that it is hurting our immigration interests and will tend to keep capital out. We know that as well as he does, and better, for we have to suffer the direct loss caused by the system of handling our wheat, while he, and such as he, make all of the money there is in wheat every time. True, it does effect the country, but the ones who cry out against the systematic robbery are not the ones who do the robbing. They are the sufferers as well as the country, and they must rise or fall with the country. If this system of wheat buying ruins the country who suffers most, Mr. Pillsbury or the farmers? He loses the opportunity for future deals, but they lose their all! He has been getting richer all of the time they have been made poorer. Under the present system the country might endure for three or four years, no one would come to make for themselves homes in a country subject to such influences, no capital seek investment here. All of these broad acres of government lands will be left uncultivated because their cultivation will be profitless. All of these broad acres of railroad lands will remain uncultivated because men cannot raise enough from them to pay for them, and yet, when we protest against the system that is leading us to destruction, Mr. Pillsbury protests because our cries of distress "will ruin the country, will drive away capital, and that he will lose his investments in elevators in the country!" He says he is losing thousands annually buying our wheat. We know better, for we know what our wheat is worth in the markets of the world and we know that the present system of buying forces us to sell at far lower prices than the eastern markets would warrant. If the elevator companies lose thousands, then where do the profits go, for certainly the farmers do not get it. Any system that is calculated to rob the producer of a just and equitable share of the profits of producing the flour is as certainly unjust as one that forces the miller to do the same, for both are entitled to a certain profit, but when, as is the present case, the millers gets it all, it is obviously a wrong system. Mr. Pillsbury admits a difference of 22 cents in the price between Minneapolis and our market and tries to explain it away. To begin with he puts the freight between here and Minneapolis at fifteen cents, which is schedule rates,—mind you, we never have seen his assertion that IT COSTS THE ELEVATOR COMPANIES fifteen cents per bushel to ship wheat, and, on the other hand, we have never seen his statement that they do not pay over ten cents per bushel. As he is an "honorable" man we would like to see his SWORN statement of just how much it does cost, anyhow! Then he says there are the elevator charges of 2½ cents per bushel and the Marshall County Leader says that Mr. Ramsey, the bonanza farmer of Marshall County, handles wheat through his own elevator for ONE CENT per bushel and says that he makes money by it. Then comes a long list of incidentals, insurance, possible decline in the market, &c., &c., &c., to account for that other four and one-half cents. All of this applies to the small amount of wheat which they have allowed to pass as No. 1 Hard and has no reference to the thousands of bushels that have been bought up as frozen wheat at from 30 to 60 cents, much of it really No. 1 hard and worth No. 1 Hard prices in the market. Will Mr. Pillsbury tell us what becomes of the margin? Knowing and feeling all these facts as well as the farmers and business men of the Northwest do, is it to be wondered at that they are agitating and demanding a fair and equal chance in an open market? They know all about the dangers of hurting the country that Mr. Pillsbury suggests, and they also know the necessity for a change before the country is ruined, and they know that keeping cool to save the country will not save it worth a cent. They know what will and they are in sober earnest in their determination to get it. They are slowly but surely organizing for the fight, if fight it must be, and woe to the men or set of men at whose doors will lie the blame. They know wherein their remedy lies and they will seek it in a manner becoming their dignity as American citizens; if they get it without further trouble, well and good; if they do not, then will they remember by whom the offense cometh and their righteous wrath will be recorded at the polls, the sure defense of freemen. We are not slaves and cannot be treated as such with impunity.

Agricultural Papers.

There are several so-called agricultural papers in the State, supposed to be devoted to the interests of the farmers especially, and they get out great and glowing prospectuses calculated to show their deep interest in the welfare of the farming community, but what do they do to prove it? We will cite one notable instance as a sample of their "deep interest!" The Minnesota Tribune claims to be the leading agricultural paper in the State; it is published at Minneapolis the city wherein exists the wheat monopoly that has been systematically engaged in robbing the farmer patrons of the Tribune of thousands of dollars annually, and the Tribune has never lifted its voice to protest against the wholesale robbery. On the other hand it has been very earnest and energetic in its defense of the system that it can not help but know is detrimental to the interests of its patrons whose complaints at the wholesale robbery fill the land. The other so-called agricultural papers, if they do not openly defend the millers' association do not espouse the cause of the farmers and so far as their help is concerned might as well be out of existence. It seems very unfortunate that Minnesota farmers have not one single agricultural paper that has back bone enough to tackle the monopoly which fact suggests the idea that Minnesota to-day offers an inviting field for the establishment of an independent agricultural paper.

Not for the Love of the Dear People.

Grafton Herald.

Mr. Hulbert of the firm of Pillsbury & Hulbert, one of the largest elevator companies in the world, is evidently wrathy over the attacks of the Grand Forks Herald on the buying and grading of wheat in this section of Dakota, and accordingly writes a letter to that paper which looks to us more like the talk of a dictator than a business man, and one who feels that this great Northwest is depending on his smile and frown. While we believe there are rights and wrongs on both sides of the question and that Pillsbury & Hurlbart should not be held up as the primary cause or even a secondary cause for the grading of wheat, we still believe Mr. Hurlbert, from the tenor of his letter, "feels his oats," and thinks this great Northwest cannot get along without him. We beg to join our humble voice with the voice of the press of this section in telling him he is much mistaken when he imagines such threats can scare the inhabitants of No. 1 Hard. The land will live and flourish when Mr. Hulbert is dead and forgotten. The farmers of Dakota are not the coal miners of Pennsylvania, and if the capitalist Hulbert pulls down every elevator he owns in Dakota, other capitalists will step into their shoes. It is not for love of the dear people, capitalists invest their money in Dakota, but to make a good paying investment, and if Mr. Hulbert thinks he can do better elsewhere he will soon find means to fulfill his wishes.

The Fergus Falls Democrat says of the situation there: "Our millers continue to pay 85 cents for wheat, five cents above the price paid by the Millers' Association where it has no opposition. True, the association, in pursuance of its well known plan to crush out all opposition, have run the prices up at Elizabeth and other towns, tapping country naturally tributary to Fergus, an extra payment that the producer of some other section has to make good in reduced prices, the association always so arranging as to be sure of its pound of flesh."

Minneapolis Tribune.

The Poland-China Hog.

Gov. Colman gives the origin of the Poland China hogs as follows:

The place of its origin is the Miami valley in Southwestern Ohio, and is the result of long, patient, intelligent and careful breeding by the practical farmers of that county. It will be therefore evident that it can be claimed by no one person. Its foundation was probably the best native stock found there selected and crossed from time to time with imported stock, some say China and Russia, and a hog owned by a man living in Ryefeld, Mass. There is probably foundation for the statement that each was used, but the history is imperfect and conflicting, and made more so by rival claimants. As feeders, and the best of feeders, the Poland-China has been known for from 40 to 50 years, but as breeders 35 to 40.

This breeds of hogs in the better corn producing states is very popular with the farmers, but we think in Minnesota the Berkshire or the Essex is preferable. There they are not so large a breed, but it takes a good deal less corn or other food to fatten them, which is a consideration with the farmers in this northern latitude. The Poland-China hog is not as great a consumer of food as the Chester White, and as it weighs as much when made into pork it is a good deal better hog to retain on the farm than any of the large breeds, especially the Chester.

Farming Too Many Acres.

In a recent journey through a good portion of the state for agricultural purposes we are more satisfied than ever from the observations we were enabled to make—that it would be better for the farmers to cultivate less land and to work it more thoroughly than they do now. If they would be satisfied to farm a fewer number of acres and put as much work on the less number as they do now on the whole, they would make more money and make it easier than they do in cultivating so much land, and in consequence of so much ground to go over it cannot receive the consideration it should. We have no doubt that the more grain produced to the acre the less it will cost per bushel. Farmers in many instances do not consider the difference between a bountiful and a small yield. With less acreage in crops, the better opportunities are afforded the farmers to bestow more work on that which is in cultivation. It is seldom that a man who has 500 acres in crops, gets as good a yield per acre as the one who has 100 acres.

Farmers vs. Elevators.

Fargo Daily Republican.

There seems to be a general cry of distress going up from all sections of Northeastern Dakota and Manitoba in regard to the management of elevators, and there must, of course, be something radically wrong, somewhere. Managers of elevators are accused of grading not in accordance with the actual quality of the grain; its weight, cleanliness, development, etc.; but with the purpose to cheat and defraud farmers of the fruits of their industry; to deprive them of their just rights and to compell them to submit to the indignity and loss of having that which may be No. 1 hard, and which he has taken much pains to cultivate and keep clean out of ambition to have perfect wheat, graded down below all justice by the hirelings of the elevator companies.

Wherever this pernicious condition of systematic robbery (for it can be denominated in no other way in plain English) exists, no excuse can be found for the elevator companies under whose authority it is prepetrated. Their hirelings may, it is true, occasionally commit errors, by which the farmer, suffers from no wrong motive on the part of the general management, but this extenuating circumstance cannot be pleaded in the many cases and localities where frauds in grading have been revealed by the local press of the Northwest during the present season. The wrong in most of these cases could not have been so persistently kept up as has been the fact, without the knowledge and consequent consent of the owners of the elevators. It therefore becomes an issue between the people—for the interests of the farmers are identical with those of the whole people—and the elevator monopoly, and something must be done to produce reform. Instance after instance has been brought to light, during the marketing of the wheat crop of 1883, where one farmer would bring a load to the elevator and receive the information that his wheat was No. 2 or 3, and taking it away, would change loads with his neighbor, who, in turn, would take the same wheat to the same elevator and the same man would pronounce it No. 1 and in some cases No. 1 hard. We have heard no complaints of this nature from the Northern Pacific elevator territory, but in the counties traversed by the Manitoba railroad and in the province of Manitoba complaints are growing loud and lusty, and no diminution of oppression is discernible, and it may therefore be concluded that these frauds are being perpetrated within the knowledge and consent of the managers of the system which enjoys the monopoly of that section. But, even if this were not entirely the case, the law of a commonwealth which permits such a condition of affairs; which allows such a door to fraud to be opened, should be replaced with such wise provisions as would compel monopolies to treat the people with justice and fairness and make erroneous grading of wheat, by which the farmers are always made to suffer, as much a fraud, and as such amenable to the law, as the obtaining of money or goods under false pretenses or any other similar crime upon our statue books.

On the other hand, the farmers themselves, if they wish to derive the best results from their labor, must adopt a system for their own personal government that will enable them to successfully combat this elevator monopoly. They must labor towards that goal from which, when reached, they can turn to the elevator men and say, "you can have my wheat within your elevator when you stand ready to give me what it is worth, and not before. I will deposit within your bins no wheat until I can get justice." In other words the farmer must diversify his productions so that the problem of his physical support is solved outside of and independent of his wheat crop. He can then put his wheat, cleaned with his own fanning mill, into his own bins and no milling association will be enabled to grind him AT THE SAME TIME IT IS GRINDING HIS WHEAT. The present elevator system rests upon the foundation of the farmer's necessity and the law permits it, but remove the foundation and the superstructure will drop to a more equitable basis as natually as water seeks its own level. The farmer possesses the key to the situation if he will but apply it. So long as the present conditions exist, so long will the present iniquitous system exist. We may bring the power of public sentiment to berr upon the managers of elevators and thus secure temporary mitigation of existing wrongs, but the people must remove the condition upon which the system is founded before lasting reforms can be reasonably expected. The monopolist, as a rule, is not remarkably sensitive to the influence of moral suasion, but he will extend justice when compelled to do so by laws and conditions.

What Others Say

OF THE MANNER IN WHICH OUR WHEAT IS HANDLED.

Pioneer Press.

That the farmers of the Red River Valley suffer from unjust discrimination on the part of railroads and elevators to the extent of 10 cents per bushel on all the wheat they raise, I am not prepared to assert; but that their grievances are such as to demand vigorous measures of redress, does not admit of question. While nothing can be gained by exaggerating causes of complaint it will not do to attempt to sneer or laugh them down as entirely baseless, or too paltry to deserve consideration. Wheat raising is the main stay of all business in this region, as it certainly constitutes the very life of the corporations which seem to be doing their level best to discourage it and render it unprofitable. This suicidal policy, as seen through the optics of an outsider, is accomplishing its death-dealing purpose by the following methods: First—Excessive freight charges—15 cents per bushel from Fargo to Minneapolis or Duluth—about as much for 250 miles as for the remaining 1,400 to 1,600 miles to New York. Second—Combinations between railroads, and between railroads and elevators. The two railroads leading from the Red River to market both charge the same excessive rate for carrying wheat. Each of these roads has its separate elevator company, owning or controlling all or nearly all the elevators on its line, and enjoying special privileges—rebates or reduced rates for carrying wheat, it is said, being among the privileges. Both of these elevator companies are understood to be largely owned and substantially controlled by the millers' association of Minneapolis. Wherever there is an elevator belonging to these companies, the railroads refuse to ship wheat unless stored in the elevator. Third—Elevator abuses—among which may be named, arbitrary grading of wheat below its real standard; excessive deductions for dirt; unfair weighing, easily made to cover from one to three bushels a load; shipment of the best grain, covered by receipts to market, and the owner subsequently compelled to accept a poorer quality. And, fourth, persistent "bearing" of the price of grain by the monopoly thus fortified in the handling and control of the entire product of the soil, through railroad power and assistance.

It is difficult to exaggerate the wrongs which have resulted fro the system which is thus extracting the heart's blood of the Dakota farmer. I use this phrase deliberately, for there nothing which tends so much to dishearten the grain raiser as the consciousness of being wronged—systematically wronged and and taken advantage of—by those who could not exist without the farmer's help, and especially that this is accomplished through the power conferred by law upon corporations. The Dakota farmer has serious obstacles to contend with—a rigorous climate, and high prices, for labor, supplies, machinery, etc.; and when, in addition, he is compelled to put his grain into hostile hands, submit to all kinds of exactions and then have a low price, and that five to ten cents below the market, thrust under his nose and told he must take it, is it any wonder that he revolts, talks of legal remedies, or proposes to turn his attention to cattle raising? And this is precisely whither we are tending, for the time approaches when there will be less grain instead of more unless the farmer is encouraged instead of being plundered. Last year we had a light crop and low price; this year the crop was better, but the price remains the same. And both years too much of the low price realized has gone to satisfy the greed of the middlemen, instead of where it belonged into the pocket of the farmer. For instance, for several weeks past the price of No. 1 hard in Minneapolis and St. Paul has ranged at and above $1, while in Fargo, both elevators have only offered 78 to 80 cents—a difference of 22 to 24 cents, or 6 to 8 cents under the market rate, less cost of carriage and handling, to say nothing of the alleged rebate to elevators. This was not so when our lines of elevators, on the two roads, competed for wheat. Then the Fargo price was up to the market, and frequently above; but since both lines passed under the influence of the millers' association the combination has been enabled to sit down on the farmers, and wring the wheat out of them at lower figures than if there were but one line. I presume there are some good fellows at the head of the railroads, as well as the millers' association, and I know there are some excellent citizens, and nice men socially, in the elevator business hereabouts. But they are only men, and consequently like other men, take advantage of their opportunities to get gain. The only question is, whether they shall be permitted to do so at the present high-pressure rate, under corporate protection, to the detriment of everybody else. The war is not on them, but on the nice little schemes which they have cooked up for their own benefit at other people's cost.

REMEDIES.

Now a word as to remedies. I have been a Dakota farmer three years, but having had other experience in life, and not a little of it, I am not chasing the phantoms known as co-operative associations, leagues, etc., certainly not with a view to running independent elevators with farmers' money. Some portion of New York was covered with co-operative stores thirty years and more ago, and every one came to grief. What is needed is a wholesome dose of law something like this: First—A law that will break down railroad discrimination, forbidding the carrying of car lots for one person at a less price than for another. The fact that a railroad can afford to furnish cars cheaper to a great elevator corporation than to a private citizen should not be allowed to outweigh the greater interest the public have in free competion and equal chances in business. The law should further guarantee equal facilities for building and handling elevators. Second Making violations of the law misdemeanors, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. Third—Providing for the appointment of a commissioner or other officer, whose business it shall be to attend strictly to the enforcement of the law. It will be in order to organize farmers' leagues, or take any other course necessary to secure the legal protection which the wheat raiser must have, or be driven to the wall.

WALDO M. POTTER.

Further Suggestions.

St. Paul Pioneer Press.

OWATONNA, Minn., Dec. 31th, 1883.—To the Editor: The intelligent and reading portion of the farmers of the Northwest must feel highly gratified in reading the recent articles in your paper in relation to the wheat question; for it is one of vital importance to the masses, especially to the farmers of the new Northwest whose wheat crop is all in all to them. And it is well that the Pioneer Press, the leading journal of the great and growing Northwest, should espouse a cause involving the material interests and welfare of her yeomanry. And I am glad to see this matter discussed in such a spirit of candor, truth and equity as has thus far characterized the discussion, and to see the press disposed to do justice to all concerned. I am a farmer and have been mainly engaged in wheat growing for more than twenty-five years; first in Wisconsin, then in Minnesota for fifteen years, and during the past six years in the valleys of the Red and James Rivers in Dakota; and have learned at least some of the ins and outs of the wheat business. In wheat growing, as well as in buying and selling, during all these years of experience and while I have heard thousands of complaints of farmers being cheated in weights, grades and prices, I have no reason to believe I did not get honest weights. Although I have, during the past eight years, weighed occasionally a load of wheat to test the honesty of the buyers, yet I can say in truth I have had no reason to complain on that score, and have observed the loudest and most numerous complaints generally come from those who have no means of their own of testing the weight, and from those who offer wheat poorly cleaned and of several varieties "mixed up," while those who offer wheat of fair quality—unmixed and fairly cleaned—are seldom heard to complain of dishonesty in weighing. But it is what we may call the "tricks of the trade" that are practiced upon farmers, that often cause great dissatisfaction, and not without good reason. One of these, which we have often seen practiced, is for the buyers, when the wheat is coming in slowly, at low prices and big margins, to put up the price of wheat at once, say from five to ten cents per bushel, for a day or two, which would start a boom and thousands of bushels would come in started for market in view of the high prices; but when the crowd arrived at the market place, there were almost as sure to find the market had fallen off ten or fifteen cents just as suddenly as it had before advanced. Telegrams have been frequently received by buyers in localities where all, or nearly all, the wheat was No. 1, to "Buy No. 2, pay" (stating price), which was perhaps a fair price for No. 2 wheat; but as little or no No. 2 was raised in that locality, those who were obliged to sell could only get No. 2 price for No. 1 wheat, as the agents said they were authorized to buy only No. 2. More frequently the buyer says, "He has no bin for No. 1 wheat," or for "No. 1 hard," as the case may be; that he gets so little of that grade it does not pay him to keep a separate bin for it; and so the careful, considerate farmer, who has taken great pains to sow clean Scotch Fife, and to keep it free from foul seed, is often obliged to suffer the same reduction of two pounds per bushel as he who brings his wheat of mixed varieties, and containing from two to five pounds to the bushel of foul and noxious seed. And the excuse that comes from the agent is that he is following his instructions. This being the true condition of things, is it strange that some unscrupulous farmers attempt to practice deceit in selling their grain in order to get even with the purchaser. All the grumbling the farmers can do, or ever have done, will not serve to correct existing evils; neither will a rehearsal of the wrongs which either party has sustained at the hands of the aggressor. It is reform that is needed. It is evident to my mind that if the farmers would unite and form themselves into clubs or societies in every town and village and go to work unitedly and intelligently in the right direction many of the evils complained of might be avoided. If existing laws are sufficient for the correction of these evils let us provide means for their enforcement; if they are not sufficient, the farmers in the Northwest, being in the majority, can easily procure the enactment of just laws to remedy the evils when it becomes their duty to see them enforced. What we want is to prevent monopoly; to give to every man an equal chance, be he high or low, rich or poor. When this consummation shall have been achieved, our fields will become still more productive and the masses of our people more prosperous by their industry, thus stimulated to greater exertion and by the consciousness that they are sure to receive ample justice and a just reward for their products.

Yours truly,

A. FARMER.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

THE

Toledo Weekly Blade.

CIRCULATION 115,000.

This vast circulation is because the Blade is a paper for the whole country. It is not thrown together, but every line of it is edited by competent hands. It is a complete epitome of the news of the week, and whoever reads the Blade carefully, needs nothing else to be well informed as to what the world is doing. Editorially the Blade has made a proud record. It has an opinion on everything that effects the people of the country, and it expresses it boldly, fearlessly and forcibly. As good as the Blade has been in the past years, we shall make it better than ever in the year to come.

Among the features for the coming year will be the regular "Nasby Letters," two serials by Nasby, entitled "Nasby in Exile," and "Nasby in the South," a serial story by Ernest Warren, entitled "Court and Camp;" a serial by John McElroy, author of Andersonville, "Reminiscences of an Army Mule;" a serial written for the Blade by an Austrian Nobleman; besides our regular departments, "Household," "Answers to correspondents" "Camp Fire," etc., etc. We publish all the news and latest corrected markets.

Politically the Blade will continue an exponent of true Republicanism, believing that the best interests of the country demand the continuance of its control in the hands of the party that represents the highest and most advanced ideas.

THE RUM POWER.

The Blade will fight this monster iniquity with all the power it possesses and in every way possible. The Blade holds the liquor traffic to be a greater curse than slavery, and a thousand times more dangerous to the country.

We ask the co-operation of every well-wisher of the Republic that our work may be effective. We ask every Republican in the United States to assist in extending the circulation of the Blade, especially among those of the Republican party who believe as we do in the necessity of Pulverizing the Rum Power. We want the Blade in as many families as possible this winter, that it may be read before the excitement of a political campaign, giving it time for its truths to take root in the minds of its readers.

THE WEEKLY BLADE, $1.00 a year, postpaid to everybody. Those preferring may receive the Blade Three Months by remitting 30 cents, or clubs of three months trial subscribers, of not less than four, 25 cents each.

'ROUND HOME.

Ed Schrader is rapidly recovering and will soon be able to be out.

Geo. Warninger has sold his interest in the saloon to August Wentzel who took possession on Monday.

That bell at 8 p. m. means that our merchants have agreed to close up at that hour and is a gentle reminder to them of their promise.

Hans Hartse, his sister Mary Hartse, and L. O. Hiturdahl, of Hawly, Clay Co., were in the city this week doing a land office business. They were the guests of Peter Cornelius Esq., while here.

Mr. G. P. Blom was in from the thirteen towns this week and reports every body happy and prosperous out there this winter. They are making active preparations for the coming spring's work.

The County Board, after having completed their labors, adjourned on Tuesday afternoon. Owing to the serious illness of his wife, Mr. Kretzschmar was unable to be present at this session.

Attention is called to the new ad. of F. T. Haseltine, the Crookston Nurseryman. Mr. Haseltine has been engaged in this busines for several years in this city and has built up a good trade and a good reputation.

Theo. Greenhalgh has returned from a visit to Grant Co., Wis., and reports business very much duller down there and times harder than here. In times of depression it is always comforting to know that it might be a great deal worse.

Martin Bang has his bulding at Ada nearly ready for occupancy and intends to try to get up early enough on Monday next to get off on the 4 o'clock train for Ada. The Ada boys will find Mart to be an No. 1 jolly good boy.

Mr. H. A. Havrevold, of Ada, was in the city this week. Mr. H. is making extensive preparations for going into the immigration business. His extensive acquaintance in the State, as well as in the old Country renders him peculiarly adapted to the business.

Nr. Ole Qualley, of the thirteen towns, formerly of Richwood, Becker Co., was in the city greeting old friends this week. Mr. Q. thinks Polk County is the boss of the Northwest as a place to live and only needs a railroad east and west to make it the best in the world.

Hon. B. Sampson has gone to Washington to try for an appropriation for the purpose of building a dam on Red Lake at the source of the Red Lake River for the purpose of increasing the water powers along the river where needed. He will also render such aid as he may be able to the Nelson pine land bill.

Messrs. Palmer & Bond start into business on the right basis by hanging out their shingle in the JOURNAL. Our friends are recommended to them when in need of any thing in their line, as they are perfectly reliable in every particular and jolly good fellows to deal with. Call in and see them at their new office on Robert St., one door west of Broadway.

The first annual ball of the Crookston Fire Department will be given at Ericsson's Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 23d 1884. The boys have spared no pains nor expense to render the occasion an enjoyable and the prospects are that there will be a large attendance and a big time. The supper will be given at the Sherman house by that prince of caterers, Wm Marin which is a sufficient guarantee for that part of the program. Prof. Martin's Orchestra will furnish the music. The proceeds will go toward uniforms for the Fire Company. Every body who enjoys a good time should be there.

Strenuous efforts are being put forth by the Knickerbocker Club of the Congregational church to arrange for an interesting and instructive loan exhibition of art and antiquities, which are hoped and expected to bear fruit and be a great pleasure to the people of Crookston and a benefit to the enterprising originators. Amusing and entertaining specialties will be added to the staple attractions of the occasion, in which the gorgeousness of the Orient will mingle its charms with the practical energy of the Occident. The management hope to secure a first-class concert as one of the features of the exhibition, and it is expected that refreshments will be served in the intermission of the more intellectual features. January 22d in the date fixed at present, which will probably not be changed. We bespeak for this, the first entertainment of the sort in Crookston, that interest and support which it deserves and will serve at once to make an enjoyable occasion for all and to benefit a worthy object.

Judge Kelso, of Bellevue, Iowa, is in the city.

J. M. Palmer, Will Carlton, D. McLennan and Wm. Campion came down to the regulation meeting on Wednesday.

Every exchange we pick up lately makes this startling announcement: "This is leap year!" Well, what of it, we are insured.

The French Band will give a grand hop in Fortier's Hall, on Monday evening, Jan. 14th, 1884. They will furnish their own music which will be excellent. The JOURNAL acknowledges an invitation to be present.

E. D. Schraeder & Co. announce this week that they are ready to supply all orders for ice for the ensuing year. Having bought the ice business of Ruedy & Kindler they will put up a large supply adequate to the demand, which they will supply at reasonable rates.

Services will be held at the Baptist chapel, Rev. H. L. House, pastor, as follows: Sunday morning at 11 o'clock; evening at 7:00 o'clock. Sunday school at 12:15 p. m. Prayer meeting Wednesday evening at 7:00. Friday evening, teachers' meeting at 7:00, held at different houses.

The meeting on Wednesday showed conclusively the existence of abuses in wheat buying, and while it is a difficult thing to say just what remedy should be applied, it is yet very evident that some remedy must be found before another crop is ready for the market and we believe it will be found.

Rev. H. L. House will deliver a series of lectures on the "Prodigal Son." The first lecture occurred last Sunday evening, and there will be a lecture each Sunday evening until the course is finished. Subject next Sunday: "The Prodigal in want." These lectures will be of special value to our young people who are cordially invited to hear them.

We learn that advices recently received from the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad officials are encouraging for the early resumption of work on that line. This item seems so natural that it occurs to us we have seen it often before and we are inclined to be rather skeptical on that point, so much so that we must see the work actually commenced before we take much stock in it.

Hack & Gallasch' errand boy Nick Nelson met with a serious accident on Wednesday. He was driving down court house hill when the horse became frightened and ran. The boy hung on until the Lake View hotel was reached when he jumped out and suffered a compound fracture of the right leg. Doctors Van Dyke and Denison attended to the sufferer who is now doing nicely,

A number of prominent citizens of Grand Forks met a number of our citizens at the Sheriff's office in this city on Wednesday and after a long deliberation a company was organized for the purpose of building a railroad from Grand Forks to Duluth. We believe this company contemplate building a main trunk line East and West through the Valley with feeders wherever needed. They intend to build to the N. P. R. R. first.

The Crookston Dramatic Association will appear on the boards on Wednesday evening, Jan. 16th, in "Nevada." This is an excellent play and will be given with fine effect and is worthy of a hearing by all. The farce, "Rural Justice," will follow, in which G. H. Palmer, Tom Jones, I. M. Underhill, Ira DeCamp and W. C. Kops will show how "Rural Justice" may be obtained. Tickets 50 cents. Reserved seats may be obtained at Morris' jewelry store at no extra cost.

D. 1882, in the office of the Register of Deeds of Polk County, in the State of Minnesota, in book "I" of mortgages on page 31. No action has been instituted at law to recover the amount secured by said mortgage.

There is claimed to be due thereon and is actually due on said mortgage at the date of this notice, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest from the fifteenth day of February, A. D. 1883, at the rate of ten (10) per cent. per annum.

The premises set forth in and conveyed by said mortgage are situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota, and are as follows, to-wit: Lot seven (7) in block fourteen (14) in the village of Carman, according to the recorded plat thereof.

The said mortgage contains a full power of sale in due form of law, in case of default of payment of the said principal or interest in said mortgage specified, or any part thereof, when due. Said mortgage also contains a stipulation on the part of the said mortgagor to pay the sum of ten dollars ($10) as and for attorney's fees for the foreclosure thereof.

Whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal sum and interest due on said mortgage, and said power of sale has become operative.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by reason of said default and by virtue of the power of sale in said mortgage contained, and pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided, the said above described mortgaged premises will be sold at public auction at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on Saturday, the first day of March, A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount then due on said mortgage, together also with ten dollars ($10) stipulated by said mortgagors to be paid as attorney fees, and including also such costs as are allowed by law.

AN APRIL MORNING.

This morning when I awoke, I heard
The low, sweet clatter of a bird
Beside my window, where I heard—
I've missed the music of so long
That filled last summer with the song
And saw a sudden flash with delight,
A flash of blue in arrowy flight,
A bit of Heaven that soar and sings,
A bit of Heaven itself on wings.

"The blue-birds has come back," I cried,
And flung the window open wide;
I leaned across the mossy sill,
And heard the laughing little rill,
That comes but once a year, and stays
Through the brief round of April days;
Then, when its banks with bloom are bright,
It seems to vanish in a night.

"PAPA'S OLD PET."

BY KATE WINDSOR.

The parlors of a private residence in the suburbs of Newton; time, 9 o'clock. Two gentlemen, evidently friends, are seated before the open grate, in which a coal fire is burning brightly. Ever and anon they lean forward in their easy chairs and extend their hands, as if to grasp more of the generous warmth which is already penetrating to every corner of the cozy apartment.

Both are well-to-do merchants of the quaint New England town in which they were born, and where they have resided all their lives. On the table by their side stands a decanter, well filled with rare old port, and an open box containing choice cigars.

"Come, fill, man!" says the host to his guest, "I don't envy the poor beggars who pass by such tipple as this. It will warm you up and give you a new lease of life."

The invitation is promptly accepted, and the action is repeated again and again. Soon their tongues are loosened, and the conversation becomes quite animated. Brilliant sallies of wit and peals of contagious laughter followed each other in quick succession, until the hour hand on the parlor clock points the hour of 12, and Richard Grant, the guest of the evening, rises hastily from his seat.

"By Jove, Percival, how time flies!" he says, "I had no idea it was so late, and I promised Mary to be home by 10 o'clock."

"That's one of the disadvantages of married life," replied the bachelor host, laughingly "You are too convivial Grant, for a benedict."

"We'll talk about that another time," responded Mr. Grant, smiling. 'Perhaps the advantages more than counterbalance the disadvantages. Anyhow, I am satisfied, Percival, and so you would be if you had as good a wife as mine."

And Richard Grant, grasping his friend's hand, wishes him "good-night," and wends his way homeward.

Ethel, the 3 year-old daughter of Mr. Grant, is dying. Already her wan little face bears a spiritual look, and her mother can no longer hide from herself the fact that death is near.

The little one has but one cry, "I want papa!" and as Mrs. Grant hears it her heart, is sad indeed. Mr. Grant is a good husband and indulgent father, but he is not what the world call a domesticated man. He knows that his child—"papa's old pet," as he is wont to call her—is on the verge of eternity. Yet so strong is his inclination for "company" that he cannot leave his friend until midnight.

So Ethel calls for papa in vain. Her mother sits by the bedside with an agonized look on her features and the hot tears coursing swiftly down her cheeks.

"Bring Teddy' mama dear."

Already the voice is becoming more feeble and tremulous. No time is to be lost, and Teddy, the baby, is held before her.

A ray of light illuminates her face as she looks lovingly on her little playmate.

"Dear Teddy!"

Suddenly, very suddenly, there comes a change.

"Oh, mamma, it is so dark—so dark!"

Mrs. Grant bends over, presses her own lips to the child's, and with a mighty effort to restrain her grief, says:

"Patience, my darling! The light is coming."

"Oh, mamma, nurse Ethel!"

The mother cannot resist the appeal. She lifts child, pillow and clothing to her lap, and awaits the end. She has not long to wait. The little face assumes a wax-like hue. Evidently the white winged messenger is near.

"By, mamma! By papa!"

A breathless silence reigns in the room. Other mothers are present, and they weep silently.

"Ethel sleep—papa—kiss!"

And Ethel sleeps—sleeps the sleep that knows no waking. Her pure spirit has gone to God who gave it, and mamma and Teddy will see her here nevermore.

* * * * * *

"What, up still, Mary? Why did you wait for me?" Mr. Grant inquires, a touch of impatience in his voice.

"Hush, Richard! There are others in the house, and trouble has come to us."

It is 1 o'clock, and Mr. Grant has just returned, flushed with wine, and in exuberant spirits. The impress of sorrow is on his wife's features, and there is such a strange light in her eyes that he pauses to look at her?"

"What do you mean, Mary?"

"Oh, Richard, we have lost 'papa's old pet!" And Mrs Grant, unable longer to restrain her grief, flings herself in her husband's arms and weeps pitifully.

Gently disengaging himself he hastens to the chamber.

Yes, it is quite true. There before him lies the earthly shell—all that is left to him of his little darling, He is quite sober now. Then comes his wife to join him, and tell him all that has taken place.

"If you had but been here, Richard," she says, plaintively, "it would not been so hard to bear. Why did you not come?"

"Well, my dear, I met Percival, and he invited me home. We had a glass or two of wine, and conversing together the time slipped away."

"Have you never thought, Richard, how it must be for me sit here hour after hour, listening for the footsteps that seldom comes till morning?"

"No, Mary, I have not thought much about it, or perhaps I should not have neglected you."

"It is natural that you should like the companionship of your friends; but it is more natural that I and the children should have your first attention. The dear child whom God has taken from us has often cried herself to sleep calling for you."

"Say no more now, Mary. I cannot bear it. We are sorely stricken, and must help each other to bear our sorrow."

The house seemed to be deserted, although several people were moving noiselessly about. With the spirit of Ethel the sunshine had for the time departed, and the shadow of grief was present everywhere.

"Earth to earth—ashes to ashes—dust to dust." Solemnly and with a measured cadence the words are uttered, and the pretty casket is lowered to its final resting place, [illegible] copiously watered with the tears of affection.

The little vine that hung so lovingly to the parent stem has been severed at last and Richard Grant mourns as only a father can. There are other children to claim his care, but just now his thoughts are centered on the one that is gone.

Mechanically he roams around the house, picking up a little shoe here, a sock there, a doll or a broken toy. They are all mementoes of "papa's old pet," and they open his wounds afresh.

Mrs. Grant, woman-like, endeavors to comfort her husband, but like David, he refuses to be comforted.

"It has taught me a lesson," he says. "Hereafter my first thought shall be for home. The time was, my dear, when I preferred your society to all other. I do not love you less now, but habit is second nature, and that of choosing other companionship has grown on me."

Teddy is now a big boy, and mamma's hair is silvered with gray; but Ethel is not forgotten, as the little grave in Avondale amply proves. Loving hands have enshrined it in a bower of roses, and many are the pilgrimages made to the silent city. For papa the place has a sad but peculiar charm, for, unknown to all, he has there made a vow that home shall have the first place in his heart's best love.

Reader, he kept the vow, and although he has laid other dear ones away to rest, never has a child of his repeated, in dying moments, "I want papa."

Things in General.

The new Sloane Laboratory at Yale has now advanced so far towards completion as to make its architectural excellence conspicuous. It is 90 feet wide, 102 feet deep and 70 feet high, with a tower 30 feet higher than the main roof. The interior, admirably adapted to its purpose, will be finished during the summer, and the building will be ready for use next fall.

Italy has over 5500 miles of railroad, which cost an average of almost $100,000 to the mile. The population of the country is more than ten times as dense in proportion to the railroad mileage as that of the United States. There are more than twice the proportionate number of employers that we have in this country but they average less than half the wages.

The people who read and like to keep abreast of the times may as well begin to inform themselves about India. There is a fermentation going on in that vast empire that will breed direful trouble ere long. Absolute despotism in India is only tempered by official stupidity and that simply makes matters worse. John Bright, in an recent address, significantly remarked that India was to be England's great problem.

The other day as a Utica clergyman and his wife were admiring the size and beauty of a $20 gold piece which the former had just received as a marriage fee, and exchanging confidences as to the best way of investing it, a messenger arrived breathless from the bridegroom to say that an unfortunate mistake had been made, that $20 was out of all proportion to his means, and that he was under the painful necessity of asking the minister to accept a much smaller sum.

The assertion that the new bridge of the New York, Lake Erie and Western railroad, four miles from Alton, is the highest railroad viaduct in the world, is disputed by La Nature, which claims that pre-eminence for the bridge of Garabit, France. That remarkable structure is 1,800 feet long, and near the middle of the great central arch the distance from the bed of the river to the rail is 413 feet. The length and maximum height of the Erie bridge are said to be respectively 2,051 and 301 feet.

The Louisiana sugar planters were unusually successful in their last year's cane crop. A portion of the sugar district was under water so late in the season after the inundation of last spring that it could not be planted but the yield on the lands that were cultivated was very good—in some cases extraordinary. In favored localities planters say they will make $400 an acre. This shows that sugar-raising in that state is a much better business than grain raising in the west.

Only two gifts of substantial value have been received by Columbus College since its foundation in 1754—one of $25,000 from Mr. Frederick Gebhard, and another, of uncertain amount, from Mr. Stephen Whitney Phœnix, which will not be available for many years to come. The up-town property of the college has now come to yield the large sum of $214,849 in ground rents, free of tax, which is equal to a capital of over $4,000,000 at 5 per cent. But the trustees want another $4,000,000.

Early in March the weather on the Mediterranean had been extremely cold. Nothing like it had been known since 1340. Between Mentone and Marseilles there had been snowstorms at several points, while the thermometer had been 10 degrees centigrade below zero. At Marseilles three persons died of the cold. Much damage was done to fruit trees in the Alpes Maritimes. Telegrams from Algeirs and Tunis say that the same low temperature prevailed in these regions, along with falls of snow.

A visitor to the old borough of Bedford, England, which has given a name to so many places in this country, asked a native, whom he casually met, what was the staple of the town. "Education,' was the reply. Four hundred years ago a London merchant endowed a school there with thirteen acres of London land, and this now supports a first-class grammar school, a commercial school, a preparatory English school, a girl's school and an infant school. No stranger can talk to the inhabitants, of whatever degree, without discovering that he is in a most exceptionally erudite place. Next to education, lace is the staple.

Peter Cooper's Will.

The will of the late Peter Cooper was filed for probate Wednesday. He bequeaths $350 annually to Maria Cooper, the wife of his brother Edward. He directs that the income of $10,000 be paid to Emma Harper, wife of John Harper, and at her death the principal to be divided among her issue. His other bequests are as follows: The interest on $10,000 to his niece, Martha Tiernan; the interest on $5000 to Menzies B. Bedell and wife. After other small bequests he divides the residue of his estate between his two children, Edward Cooper and Sarah Amelia Hewitt, in equal shares. He appoints as his executors Edward Cooper and Abram S. Hewitt, his son-in-law. The instrument is dated 22d of May, 1871. In a codicil to the will he bequeathed to the "Cooper Union for the Advancement of Science and Art" $100,000. The estate of Mr. Cooper amounts to about $2,000,000. About $200,000 of this amount will be required to meet the special bequests which Mr. Cooper made, and which were not provided for by his will. This leaves about $1,800,000 to pass under the will.

The Keystone's Rich Legislators.

The Pennsylvania state senate has an abundance of rich members. E. K. B. Coxe is supposed to be worth $3,000,000; John E. Reyburn, President pro tem, who, like Mr. Coxe, [illegible] is said to be a triple millionaire. [illegible] oil king, is said to be worth $500,000. Hall, of Elk, has $250,000 invested in lumbering and other enterprises. Dill, of Erie, is worth $200,000. Stehman has several farms in Lancaster County, and is worth about $150,000. McNeill, of Allegheny; Laird, of Westmoreland, and perhaps one or two others, are estimated at $100,000.

Seedy Scientists.

The late Peter Merian, the Swiss scientist was a very hospitable man and gladly entertained at either his town or country house all who called on him. Many of his visitors were rather seedy and threadbare in apparel, and others had curious manners, and so his wife came to the conclusion that all scientific men were a ragged or eccentric set; such for instance, as Leopold van Buch, who was always so odd, Charles Lyell, who was wretchedly absent minded, and others. One day, it is said, in 1846, a young geologist presented himself at the museum, taking notes of all the fossils. Merian, struck by the application and good air of the foreigner, asked him to dine with him; "because," said he. "Madame Merian is always reproaching me for bringing home the most indecorous and rough-looking set of fellows; and I shall be glad to show her one man at least on whom she will look without contempt."

An Old Postmaster General.

The Washington Star has the following: "Judge Lawrenson, the veteran notary of the postoffice department, who has sworn in twenty postmaster generals and served under twenty-seven, in talking to a reporter, said that the venerable Joseph Burrows, one of the earliest officers of the general postoffice, related to him the following incident: "One morning Postmaster General Meigs called me, and, handing me a letter, said, "Mr. Burrows, please take this letter up to the president. It is my resignation." I was greatly surprised at this, but proceeded on his errand. At the White House I found President Monroe in a pleasant mood, and handed him the letter. The president read it, and then said, "Mr. Burrows, please return this letter to the postmaster general with my compliments, and tell him when I want his resignation I will send for it." I then returned with the message."

Lord Churchill of England.

Young Lord Randolph Churchill, who is stirring up the tory party in England, is the second son of the millionaire duke of Marlborough, and is the husband of an American wife (daughter of Leonard Jerome of New York), as well as the brightest of the younger Tory nobleman. He is only thirty-four years of age, and sits in the commons for the ancient royal borough of Woodstock. He is a fine speaker, has a ready mind, and does a great deal more thinking than most of his class. The time must soon come, in the order of things, when both Salisbury and Northcote will be forced to retire from the laborous task of active leadership, and Lord Churchill is now their likeliest successor.

"Thomas' Eclectric Oil"

Has been a good deal harped upon in the papers and with excellent effect. Not alone, however, by reason of newspaper notices has its sale grown so enormously; the people have advertised it; its merit has made it.

"Rode thirty miles for it." Daniel Plank, Brooklyn, Pa.

"Worth five times its price." S. B. Durley, mate steamer Arizona, on great lakes.

"Acts like a charm." Helen E. Appleton, Troy, N. Y.

"My family use it, the hired men use it, I use it." Wm. H. Kirkpatrick, 411 3d ave., Evansville, Ind.

"It is a remarkable medicine. I do not know its equal." Mrs. C. A. Taylor, 250, Folsom st., Buffalo, N. Y.

"I have never seen a medicine more perfectly adapted to its various applications than Thomas' Eclectric Oil." Rev. E. F. Crane, Dunkirk, N. Y.

For colds, coughs, diphtheria and catarrh, Thomas' Eclectric Oil is tip-top; while for an ache, or a pain, or a soreness there is nothing better in the world. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is sold everywhere.

The Boston Journal puts an evident truism very concisely when it says: "The modern weather prophet, of the Vennor-Wiggins type, exists chiefly for the purpose of beguiling the public into the purchase of his almanacs."

HYPOCHONDRIA.

The Mysterious Element in the Mind That Arouses Vague Apprehensions—What Actually Causes It.

The narrative below by a prominent scientist touches a subject of universal importance. Few people are free from the distressing evils which hypochondria brings. They come at all times and are fed by the very flame which they themselves start. They are a dread of coming derangement caused by present disorder and bring about more suicides than any other one thing. Their first approach should be carefully guarded.

Editor's Herald: It is seldom I appear in print and I should not do so now did I not believe myself in possession of truths, the revelation of which will prove of inestimable value to many who may see these lines. Mine has been a trying experience. For many years I was conscious of a want of nerve tone. My mind seemed sluggish and I felt a certain falling off in my natural condition of intellectual acuteness, activity and vigor. I presume this is the same way in which an innumerable number of other people feel, who like myself are physically below par, but like thousands of others I paid no attention to these annoying troubles, attributing them to overwork, and resorting to a glass of beer or a milk punch, which would for the time invigorate and relieve my weariness.

After awhile the stimulants commenced to disagree with my stomach, my weariness increased, and I was compelled to resort to other means to find relief. If a physician is suffering he invariably calls another physician to prescribe for him, as he cannot see himself as he sees others; so I called a physician and he advised me to try a little chemical food, or a bottle of hypophosphates. I took two or three bottles of the chemical food, with no apparent benefit. My lassitude and indisposition seemed to increase, my food distressed me. I suffered from neuralgic pains in different parts of my body, my muscles became sore, my bowels were constipated, and my prospects for recovery were not very flattering. I stated my case to another physician, and he advised me to take five to ten drops of Magende's solution of morphine, two or three times a day, for the weakness and distress in my stomach, and a blue pill every other night to relieve the constipation. The morphine produced such a deathly nausea that I could not take it, and the blue pill failed to relieve my constipation.

In this condition I passed nearly a year wholly unfit for business, while the effort to think was irksome and painful. My blood became impoverished, and I suffered from incapacity with an appalling sense of misery and general apprehension of coming evil. I passed sleepless nights and was troubled with irregular action of the heart, a constantly feverish condition and the most excruciating tortures in my stomach, living for days on rice water and gruel, and, indeed, the digestive functions seemed to be entirely destroyed.

It was natural that while in this condition I should become hypochondrical and fearful suggestions of self destruction occasionally presented themselves. I experienced an insatiable desire for sleep, but on retiring would lie awake for a long time tormented with troubled reflections, and when at last I did fall into an uneasy slumber of short duration, it was disturbed by horrid dreams. In this condition I determined to take a trip to Europe, but in spite of all the attentions of physicians and change of scene and climate, I did not improve and so returned home with no earthly hope of ever again being able to leave the house.

Among the numerous friends that called on me was one who had been afflicted somewhat similarly to myself, but who had been restored to perfect health. Upon his earnest recommendation I began the same treatment he had employed but with little hope of being benefited. At first I experienced little, if any, relief, except that it did not distress my stomach as other remedies or even food had done. I continued its use, however, and after the third bottle could see a marked change for the better, and now after the fifteenth bottle I am happy to state that I am again able to attend to my professional duties. I sleep well, nothing distresses me that I eat, I go from day to day without a feeling of weariness or pain, indeed I am a well man, and wholly through the influence of H. H. Warner & Co.'s Tippecanoe. I consider this remedy as taking the highest possible rank in the treatment of all diseases marked by debility, loss of appetite, and all other symptoms of stomach and digestive disorders. It is overwhelmingly superior to the tonics, bitters, and dyspepsia cures of the day, and is certain to be so acknowledged by the public universally. Thousands of people to day are going to premature graves with these serious diseases, that I have above described, and to all such I would say "Do not let your good judgment be governed by your prejudices, but give the above named remedy a fair and patient trial, and I believe you will not only be rewarded by a perfect restoration to health, but you will also be convinced that the medical profession does not possess all the knowledge there is embraced in medical science."

A Cure of Pneumonia.

Mr. D. H. Barnaby, of Owego, N. Y., says that his daughter was taken with a violent cold which terminated with pneumonia, and all the best physicians gave the case up and said she could not live but a few hours at most. She was in this condition when a friend recommended DR. WM. HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS and advised her to try it. She accepted it as a last resort, and was surprised to find that it produced a marked change for the better, and by persevering in its use a permanent cure was effected.

$50,000 IN PRESENTS GIVEN AWAY!
OUR SECOND AWARD! This Offer Good Until May 1, 1884.

THE FARM, FIELD AND FIRESIDE has now over 100,000 actual subscribers. Being desirous of having its circulation more widely extended and increased to over 200,000, the proprietors again announce another award of $50,000 to be made May 1st, 1884, when they will have secured another 100,000 subscribers. The award of $40,000 just completed by us fully establishes our reputation and the fact that we will carry out and fulfill to the letter the promises herein made. The circulation of the FARM, FIELD AND FIRESIDE is now the largest ever attained by any paper of its kind in the world. We still want to add 100,000 more yearly subscribers to our already large list, and in order to secure them we propose to distribute the $50,000 that we shall get for the sale of advertising space and our profits in the paper for the coming year. This new award will be conducted in a similar manner as our last wherein we gave away in December Forty Thousand Dollars. In the last award five persons received the grand presents or the Five One Thousand Dollar Bonds. In our new award to be made on May 1st, we have a larger number of cash prizes and more numerous and costly presents, thereby giving more opportunities to the masses to secure a good present than for one or two persons to get the bulk of the award. We are positive that this plan is better than our last.

SHE.

We shall live to repent—
Prithee heed, love, my warning—
If we marry in Lent,
We shall live to repent.
For if I should consent,
The old proverb's truth scorning,
We should live to repent.
Prithee heed, love, my warning.

HE.

But since all should repent,
Let's repent, love, together.
It is proper in Lent
That we all should repent.
Nay, then, sweetheart, consent,
In this sad Lenten weather;
Since we all should repent,
Let's repent, love, together!
—Eleanor Putman in Boston Courier.

"A LOVE OF A BONNET."

"Oh, I want to go! I want to go so much!" said Ella Haskell to herself. "And to think that I must stay at home just for want of a bonnet! It is too bad. I declare it is. I might just as well bought one last week when I went to town, but I thought the fashions were not settled yet. I can't wear black velvet with a blue muslin. And it's the nicest picnic we've had. Oh, dear!"

"A letter, Ell! I've been to the post-office to get 'em. And rice and raisins for a pudding!" shouted little Haskell, tossing a white envelope upon his sister's bureau as he rushed past her door.

"From Cousin Hester," said Ella, glancing at the envelope. "Full of brag as usual, I suppose? What airs she did give herself while she was here, to be sure! All because her father has made a little more money than 'pa has. I wonder she isn't ashamed to write."

However, she opened the letter at once, and sat down to read it. It opened thus:

DEAR ELLA,—I find I have left my bonnet box behind me. I put it on the upper shelf of the closet in my room; and as there was no occasion for anything but my hat, and the bonnet was really too handsome to wear on ordinary occasions, I never looked at it again. Please send it the first opportunity.

Ella read no more. The letter dropped out of her hand. She flew out of her room, and into the spare bedroom that had been given to her cousin during her visit, and there, upon the upper shelf, she found a box, which, being taken down and opened, revealed a dainty bonnet of palest blue satin, with delicate feathers to match, and two pale pink crushed roses daintily perched upon the crown—a bonnet that bore upon its lining the signature of a Parisian milliner.

"The most beautiful bonnet I ever saw!" cried Ella.

As she spoke she perched it lightly on her head, saw that it became her, and on the instant was overcome by temptation.

"If I could only borrow it and wear it at the picnic!" she whispered.

She caught up the hand-glass and looked at her profile. It was the most charming view of her face.

"I will," she added. "Didn't she borrow my blue veil and wear it entirely out, and lose my silver thimble, and tuck up the curtains of her room so that they had to be done over again as soon as she was gone? And it cannot do much harm to a bonnet to wear it once very carefully."

And Ella sat down at once to write a little note of acceptance to the young man who had "requested the pleasure of her company."

"Going?" said Mrs. Haskell, lifting her eyebrows is surprise. "Well, I hope you'll enjoy yourself; but will you feel comfortable in your old bonnet?"

"Well I'll manage somehow, 'ma," said Ella, not daring to meet her mother's eye for she knew what her opinion would have been about her borrowing a handsome bonnet in that fashion; and the problem she was now solving was how to conceal the fact that she wore it from the members of the family. The only plan that occurred to her was to cover it with gramma's big brown veil, which she borrowed for the purpose, receiving many injunctions not to tear or lose it.

Silas Perkins came in his trap to the door at the proper hour, and Ella ran out of the house and entered the vehicle rather hastily, with her head apparently enveloped in a snuff colored turban.

Out of sight of the porch, Ella unpinned the snuff-colorhd veil and, and sat beside Silas Perkins in a blue and rose tinted bonnet that took his breath away with admiration.

In fact, it was the sight of that bonnet, and the pretty face under it, and the tints of gold it brought out in the waving hair, that made Silas forget that his horse Napoleon would not bear the whip, and gave him a graceful flick upon his neck, whereupon Napoleon at once asserted his independence by running away. The road was smooth, and in the course of a quarter of an hour, as Silas declared, he brought that horse to his senses. The actual fact was that Napoleon grew tired of running and moderated his pace. But meanwhile a dreadful thing had happened. The branch of a tree which grazed the vehicle in passing had whipped away that dainty Paris bonnet, which weighed next to nothing, and Ella, as she clutched the back of her seat in terror for her life, was utterly unaware of the fact. In fact, the scene of the picnic was reached before either of the occupants of the vehicle were aware of what had occurred.

Meantime Aunty Wheeler, whose house faced the road, had seen the runaway, and noticed the accident to the bonnet; and had sent her grandson, Peter, to take it from the oak bough. After waiting at her door for an hour and a half she concluded that either Ella was killed or had gone where she lost her bonnet, and returned to her kitchen.

"Carry the bonnet home to Mrs. Haskell's Peter," said she. "Say that Ella lost it, but don't say that she was run away with, for there's no need of frightening her ma without cause. Ella is just hity-tity enough not to know whether her bonnet is on her head or off it."

Peter, a shy, white-headed child, obeyed with with sulky reluctance. He carried the bonnet to the house, and greatly disliking explanations and questions, performed his errand by poking it in at an open window under which a table happened to stand. It was the spare bedroom window, and five minutes after Nancy, the new servant, came into the room to wash that very window. She found the bonnet on a chair, and being a tidy soul, opened the closet and put it into the bonnet-box which stood there, shutting down the cover. Half an hour from that time the spare bed-room had resumed its usual condition of shadowed order.

As for poor Ella, what she suffered no one knew. The picnic was one long misery to her. She thought of nothing but the lost bonnet. If she could have forgotten it, Silas would not have permitted the oblivion, for he talked about it constantly, and the fact that Ella Haskell was run away with and had lost her bonnet was the topic of the day. Nobody found the lost treasure, of course. And it so happened that during the afternoon Aunty Wheeler was sent for in her capacity of nurse, by a certain Mrs. Jenkins, who lived twenty miles away, and that she did not return to her own home for three good months. Therefore there was no comfort for Ella on her home-coming, and nothing remained for her but full confession. Solemn scenes ensued. Correspondence commenced between the two matrons. Ella had the mortification of knowing that her cousin knew she had borrowed her bonnet because she had no nice one of her own. And horror fell upon the Haskell family when, having insisted on paying for the bonnet, they heard that it cost fifteen dollars.

Ella "did" with her last winter's dress that year, and very shabby it grew before spring, and with spring came a visit from Cousin Hester, who, much against her will was sent to her uncle's by her father every year. More airs, more graces than ever. A large trunk, or rather larger trunks, and more extensive boasting. Ella conducted her relative to the spare bedroom, fresh with its new curtains, and the girl began at once as Ella had declared she knew she would.

"There's my bonnet-box. Dear me, how did you lose the bonnet without knowing it? You never thought of the long pin. Here it is in the cover. That cost five shillings; it has an enamelled head. I wonder who picked it up. Why, Ella, where did you find it?"

"I never found it," replied Ella, snappishly, "and as 'ma paid for it, I think we may as well drop the subject."

"But here it is," said Hester.

"Here what is?" asked Ella.

"The bonnet," said Hester.

And there it was, indeed, as Ella saw on looking in. Fresh in tint and dainty in shape as ever. How it came there was a mystery doomed never to be unravelled.

The new servant had long before "given sauce" and been dismissed; and Aunty Wheeler had never found time to "slip over to Mrs. Haskell's" in her brief sojourns at home.

Mrs. Haskell declared that Ella never put it on at all; but Silas Perkins, now her accepted lover, remembered the blue satin and crushed roses too well to admit of that explanation. No spiritualists were on hand, and Ella felt the situation beyond her. But she had suffered too much for that bonnet.

"Ma," she said eagerly, "you paid for that bonnet. I went without my winter dress for it. It is mine."

"Well, yes, so it seems to me," said Mrs Haskell.

"I'm sure I don't want last year's bonnet," said Hester, scornfully.

"Very well; let nobody approach me," said Ella, seizing the tongs which stood near a small fire in the open fireplace.

She left the sitting-room in which this conversation occurred, and returned, bearing the bonnet before her between the tongs.

"There!" she said, depositing it in the midst of the flames. "It is mine, and that is what I choose to do with it."

Nobody stirred. The satin blazed, the flowers crisped to tinder, the feathers smelled as burning feathers will.

"I never knew you had such a temper, Ella," said her mother; but Ella was happy for the first time since she had lost her cousin's bonnet.

The April Foolishness.

Dr. Langer states that the fat of a child "contains less ollic acid, but more palmitic and stearic acid than that of adults, besides being richer in the butyric and caproic acids." Perhaps this is what causes the infant to yell so vociferously during the night, but we can't always tell. It may be the richness of the butyric and caproic acids, and it may be a displaced pin.

A fair young damsel went into the business place of one of Troy's most worthy and kindly merchants, and expressed a desire to purchase a certain article. Several specimens were shown her, and she finally made choice of one as meeting her wishes. She hesitated a moment, and then asked: "Do you make a reduction to ministers?" "Yes," replied a gentlemanly attendant, "are you a minister's wife? "No-o-o." was the blushing response. "but I expect to be soon." The reduction was granted. —Troy Times.

Half way anyhow: "You're getting quite bald, old man; you try rum" "Rum! So I have. I've bought gallons of it." "Ah, I see; but then, p'r'aps, you could never get it any further than your mouth!"—London Judy.

Prohibition items: "Wake me up darling, to-night and give me a toddy," said an Austin inebriate to his wife, as they were about to retire for the night. "But how will I know when you want one?" "You can't make a mistake, I am always thirsty when I am woke up."—Texas Siftings.

An ear for music." "Yes," said Fenderson, "I've got quite an ear for music: "You have quite an ear, sure enough," said Fogg, "but I wasn't sure it was for music. I didn't know but it was intended for a windmill."—Boston Transcript.

Her comparison: "Here I've been talking for an hour," exclaimed an auctioneer, "and I haven't got an offer.' "Half an hour indeed!" murmured an elderly maiden. "What's half an hour to many long years and still no hope of an offer?"—Boston Transcript.

—Climatic: A Boston lady, who has an orange grove in Florida was speaking enthusiastically one day of the climate there. "But how is it for invalids?" said a friend: "should you want to go there for your health?" The lady instantly replied: "Oh, I shouldn't want to go to heaven for my health."

He Meant Well.

The St. Louis Republican tells of an amusing incident that occurred in a church of that city a couple of Sundays ago. A gentleman was the owner of a very unique pin in the shape of a large black spider, the body of which is a large amethyst. This ornament was presented to a young lady friend and she wore it on her dress to service. It so happened, and unfortunately, that a young gentleman near her perceived the lifelike ornament on the young lady's dress, and to all appearances crawling up to her face. A look of terror overspread his features, and without any hesitation he endeavored to brush off what to him appeared a tarantula. He missed it and brushed at it again, when the almost audible smiles of a few who witnessed the gentleman's heroic endeavors attracted the young lady's attention. He became very red in the face when he discovered his mistake, and it will be a long time before he attends that church again.

The World's Champion Checker Player.

From the Elmira Free Press.

A man with a gripsack and a large cane, dressed like a farmer and looking as if he had just blown in from the backwoods, came to town. The stranger was James Wiley, the champion checker player of the world. Mr. Wiley is a Scotchman, and has beaten the best players that the world has produced, and now he is regarded by all as the champion. He is about sixty years of age. His hair is white, and like Horace Greeley he wears a beard under his chin. His deafness makes it impossible to carry on a conversation with him. He sits quietly, not taking his eyes off the board and taking no notice of those about him or anything except the game. He wears glasses, and has an intelligent and kindly face and good head. He has done nothing else but play checkers ever since he was fifteen years of age. His game cannot be beaten. He looks away into a game, and before an ordinary opponent has commenced he has won the game. He makes a good living by playing, as there are plenty of enthusiasts who willingly give twenty-five cents to play with him and plenty more who will give that amount to see him play. He lives in Scotland and has been in this country about six months, although this is not his first visit.

Aunt Philura's Face-Wash.

So, that afternoon, we got ready and went to the matinay. Beforehand, I bein' ready to start first, went into Cousin Sarah's room. She didn't hear me comin' I guess, for she kind o'started when she see me and set a bottle down on a buro. But it was too late to back out, and she took it up again, and went to putting on stuff on her face. That's what made her skin look so young-like I'd noticed it, specially afternoons, says I:

"Land, Sarah! What is that stuff?' "It's something to preserve and beautify your complexion," says she.

"Is that what makes your skin look so young and fresh?" says I. "I thought it was probable because you don't have to work over a hot cook-stove."

"This is it," says she; "you'd look ever so much better if you'd use it. Let me put some on your face, too. It's a French preparation, and you'll look twenty years younger." And she got me into a chair and before I knew it, she had it all over my face. I s'pose all women, at the bottom, want to look beautiful. Here was I, a woman of over 50 years, never havin' had any pretensions to any beauty, and there bein' no earthly reason why I should want to look better'n the average—here was I, sittin' down and bein' anointed with French preparations. When she got through, "You must keep still," says she, "and let it dry nicely."

"There!" says she, in a minute, "now look in the glass."

I did, an' I declare, I should never have mistrusted 'twas Philura Winters. My face was of the most lovely tint. I ain't never seen no girl that had a prettier skin than mine was. The first thing I thought was, "Now I'll get a bottle of this to take home."

"My face, as it got dried off tho', begun to feel hot an' kind o' drawn up. Cousin Sarah was ready and says "Come on," but I said, feelin' so I couldn't stand it, "Do wait till I can wash this stuff off'n my face. Why, my skin feels as tho' 'twas crackin' open every time I move a muscle."

"Oh," says she, laughin' "you'll git over that in a few moments. Come out in the fresh air."

"I didn't more'n half believe her, but she hurried me along and didn't give me no chance to wash my face. John jined us, an' says he:

"By Jiminy! Philip! I never seen you lookin' so all-fire putty since I took you to ride the time we got into the brook the spring before we was married."

Any woman would feel flattered at this, but it didn't prevent my face from feelin' all cracked up; an once or twice I actually looked into them big store windows that are as good as a lookin'-glass, to see if my face wan't cracked open in places; but it wan't."

After the matinay when we'd got out-doors John he stared at me, an' says he:

"For the Lord sake, Philury, what in tunket ails your face? It's all straaked and speckled"

"I shouldn't wonder," says I. "It' been crackin' open all the afternoon, an' I think likely it does look bad."

But I was afraid, and mortified too, as we hurried home, an' I looked in the glass in Sarah's room, and "I should think as much!" said I to Sarah. Why! my face was in an awful condition. The tears had run down through that stuff and washed it off in streaks, an' my nose stood out red an flamin' in the midst of the queerest lookin' countenance you ever see!

"There!" says I to Sarah, scrubbin' my face in her bath-room; "when you catch me anointin' my face, or allowin' it to be annointed with any more of your French dressin', you jest let me know."—(Aunt Philura in Boston Times.

Wilkie Collins on American Novelists.

Letters from London.

"Whom do you think comes near to Walter Scott?" "Nobody comes near to him in English fiction. He was great by himself. I know that I am in a minority of one almost in saying that of the American authors Fenimore Cooper is the greatest and of the greatest in the world. It isn't long ago that I was in Italy and found myself over night in a remote town in the north. As I always do, I found my way to a theatre, where there was a performance by local talent of one of Verdi's operas. When the act was over the orchestra, which was a remarkably good one, by the way, went out, as is their custom, all except their old men, who took up books and began to read! My curiosity was excited and I could not forbear leaning over and asking what they had. One of them had Cooper's classics, 'The Pathfinder,' the others were reading Sir Walter Scott's stories, and wherever I went I always found these books. They are the two writers who penetrated to countries where no writer of the English ever gets a hearing. I was pained in America to see how little Cooper was appreciated. In Buffalo I bought that set of his works, and the bookseller could not restrain his surprise that I should want an expensive edition. He had rare calls for them. America has but one novelist—that was Cooper. Indeed, she has had only a few writers of any kind of great eminence. He was original; he was the founder of the ocean romance. No man wrote like him. He gave the sea color to his stories, and even when dealing with the technicalities of the sailor's life he yet maintained the interest of the story, even though the readers cannot understand the terms made use of. His Indian stories are alike filled with the atmosphere of their surroundings."

How Booth Stabbed Rathbone.

An Albany relative of the Rathbones tells the following story in regard to the colonel's being in President Lincoln's box the night of the assassination: The circumstances that led to their being there were rather curious. There was to be a special performance at the theater—a patriotic song was to be sung, I believe—and President Lincoln, Gen. Grant and Mr. Stanton were to be present. Mr. Stanton sent word that he could not come; Gen. Grant was suddenly called away from the city, and President Lincoln was taken ill on the afternoon of the performance. Mrs. Lincoln thought she would be compelled to occupy the theater box alone, and therefore asked Clara Harris to accompany her, which she agreed to do. In the meanwhile the theatrical managers came to Mr. Lincoln, and begged him to go, telling him that the entertainment would be a failure if he did not, as Gen. Grant and Mr. Stanton would not be present. Mr. Lincoln good-naturedly consented to go. He and his wife went to get Miss Harris, and finding Maj. Rathbone at her home, invited him to accompany them. When Booth had fired his fatal shot at President Lincoln the assassin was seized by Maj. Rathbone. Booth dropped his pistol and stabbed at Rathbone with a two-edged dagger. The blade of the weapon went through Rathbone's left arm and nearly reached his breast. He did not recover from the wound for two months.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Brief Farming Notes.

If you are behind in your work, it is better to hire additional hands and rush things through than to remain behind all summer. Or do you prefer to be behind?

Maine has forty-nine cheese factories, with an average of 107 cows to each, sixty being the lowest, 500 the highest number. The total product of all these factories during the last year was 568,-834 pounds of cheese, the average price received being 12 1-2 cents per pound.

President L. S. Coffin, of the Iowa Improved Stock Breeders' Association, bears this witness of effect of conference for mutual good: "The great strides made in the last decade, especially by those engaged in the fine and extending dairy work of the west, are to a great extent due to discussion and exhibition."

If salt is to be sown on wheat, spring is the right time to apply it. The usual application is about five bushels per acre. The effects usually attributed to salt sown on wheat are that it stiffens the straw, brightens the berry, tends to prevent rust and increases the yield about four or five bushels per acre.

When the escape of milk is prevented by an obstruction in the teat the opening should be freed by the use of a tube, known as a milking tube, which is carefully pushed into the teat and forces a way through the obstruction. The tube may be left in the duct and closed by a small plug, which is removed at milking-time, or the tube itself is removed and the milk drawn in the usual manner.

Good water lime or cement will make as good a floor for your milk cellar as any one could desire, and it will have no effect upon the milk, as we know from long experience. Put a good thickness of broken stone underneath, in order to have a solid foundation upon which to lay the cement, and you will have a smooth and hard floor that will last a lifetime or longer.

An excellent coop for young chickens is made as follows: Make a frame or box of boards, 2 feet by 3, close on three sides, and lathed up and down on one side; put on a sloping roof hinged at the front over the laths, which should be six inches higher than the hind part. Hang a glazed sash in the front 6 inches from the ground to leave room for the chicks to go in and out, and to prevent beating in of rain or cold winds, and fit a piece of board 6 inches wide below this to close up the coop at night and for a feeding board by day. This coop can be moved from place to place to furnish clean ground for the floor; the best floor is the ground.

To prevent the hair from falling out, try first wetting the hair at night with salt and water. Mild sage tea is also excellent. If these remedies do not effect a speedy cure, try this: Get a little bottle of brandy, and put in all the salt that that it will absorb; wet the head with this two or three times a day.

For the common sitting-room a table-spread made of Canton flannel will be useful; the border made of the figured or brocaded Canton flannel, which is a novelty in the stores just now; or you may trim it simply with a strip of cretonne.

Dr. Robert H. Bakewell condemns the common practice of keeping lights in the bedrooms of children. He says it has an injurious effect upon their nervous system. Instead of the perfect rest the optic nerves ought to have, and which nature provides for by the darkness of the night, these nerves are perpetually stimulated, and, of course, the brain and the rest of the nervous system suffer. Children thus brought up are exceedingly timid for years after on going into the dark.

If the arnica with which bruised limbs are bathed is heated, its good effects are perceptible much earlier than if it is applied while cold. If arnica is to be taken as a remedy, as so many physicians recommend, in cases of severe sprains, it should be prepared with water in this proportion: a teaspoonful of arnica in a goblet two-thirds full of water; and of this a teaspoonful is to be taken once an hour or once in two hours, as the severity of the case determines.

Cooking forms part of the regular education of young ladies in Vienna, but they do not learn the art at cooking clubs, or at public lectures, as in England and this country, and they are rarely taught in their own kitchens. It is the custom to go to some great house—that of a princess, or some very rich banker, where there are famous chefs, who give lessons in cookery. When a chef engages to cook for a nobleman he usually stipulates that he is to have the privilege of teaching a certain number of young ladies. These young ladies need not even know the mistress of the house, and they make their arrangements with the cook only,

Veterinary Notes.

Horses' hoofs become brittle because they are too dry—possibly from a diseased condition of the feet, or from the use of grease or oil or tar, which removes the water for them. Horn should contain about 20 per cent. of water when in a healthful state. It is then elastic and will not break. Cold water will generally restore the hoofs when they become too dry. It may be applied by means of wet bandages in the day-time and in the stable by providing a puddle of clay or wet muck for the horse to stand in. All other remedies are injurious.

Calves are subject to a fatal disorder known as anthrax fever, otherwise black leg or black quarter. They are taken very suddenly, become adverse to moving, and sleepy and stupid, and die quickly. The best remedy is to give the calf one ounce of linseed-oil as soon as it seems to be ailing; after that give a teaspoonful of sulphur and one of cream of tartar in a tablespoonful of molasses. The dead calves should be buried deeply and all the sick ones kept separate from the well ones, as the disease is contagious.

Moon-blindness or recurring ophthalmia is not an uncommon disease in horses. It is constitutional, and usually ends in blindness. The first symptoms are weakness and inflammation, with running at the eye. Then a cloud gathers, which in time disappears. After a few weeks it returns, and so on, worse at each repetition until the eye is permanently clouded. The remedy is to give the horse a pound of epsom salts on the first appearance of the trouble; to bathe the eye in cold water, in a pint of which half a dram of sulphate of zinc has been dissolved. Shade the eyes with a dark green cloth drawn over the blinders so that the horse can see downward. Keep the stable darkened and quite clean and free from strong odors. While the trouble lasts blow into the eye in the evening a pinch of burned alum, and give daily one dram of saltpetre in the feed. The teeth have nothing to do with it. It is constitutional.

A horse that is hide-bound will be relieved by a dose of one pint of linseed-oil and changing the feed, giving a bran mash with a quart of linseed-oil-meal in it once a day. No corn should be given for a time until the hair is shed healthfully.

Spring Halt.

Spring halt is an affection of the nerves of the leg, or it may be of those of the loins which control the nerves of the limbs. If the animal appears tender upon the loins, this may be also due to the same cause as the nervous disorder, and that may very possibly arise from disease of the spinal meningitis. This may even cause urinary disturbances, because the whole nervous system of these organs will be involved, as well as that of the digestive organs and the limbs, by this disease, so that the treatment in such a case should be for the primary cause and not the local disorder. The treatment should be to apply mustard plaster to the loins, to purge freely by aloes, four drams, or linseed-oil, one pint, repeated, and to give one-half ounce doses of bromide of potassium daily. Swollen gums and palate in a horse indicate bad health. The treatment should be to give a dose or two of physic. A pint of linseed oil, or a pound of epsom salts, and to wash the month with solution of borax. Feeding too much whole cord will sometimes produce this trouble.

Kicking Cows.

We see many remedies for curing a cow of kicking while being milked. The best remedy is prevention. This can only be applied by handling the heifer while young, teaching her by gentleness and kindness that man is her friend and does not wish to harm her; but as this is not always possible, it is well to know how to prevent kicking after a cow has reached mature years. We have noticed the following remedy many times: "I tied the cow up by the head (not legs), procured a good switch (not club), and proceeded to milk, and for every kick I returned one good smart blow with the switch on the offending leg. A few kicks and blows sufficed for that time. At the next milking only three or four blows was required and at the third milking one kick and one blow was sufficient, and ever after the cow was as gentle as need be." Three important points are to be observed in the above treatment: First, uniform kindness and gentleness; second, never strike a cow for kicking when loose in the yard, or she will learn to run from you; third, only one blow for each kick. With the right kind of person and the right kind of cow, we have no doubt that the above remedy will be efficient, but there are few persons who will stand "a few kicks," and still be uniformly kind and gentle.—Breeders' Live Stock Journal.

CHILDREN AT SCHOOL.

Some Sensible Advice to Parents.

From a Circular Issued by N. Y. Board of Health.

To the Parent or Guardian:—See to it that the child goes to school in a proper condition. This means, first of all cleanliness all over. A child not washed all over, is not fit for school. Some need a bath oftener. Children need to wash the face and hands and to comb and brush out the hair at night as well as morning. Let the mouth be rinsed with water, morning and evening, or the teeth be brushed, to as to have a pure breath. Have clean, thin flannel for clothing, next to the skin, with such additional outside garments as may be necessary for warmth, and shoes and stockings that will protect the feet from dampness. A dry pair of socks and a clean handkerchief are not amiss in the satchel. Let no child start for school with damp clothing. When active, we can bear dampness awhile; but to sit in wet clothing is always a risk. Tell the child if he is damp or chilly to let the teacher know it.

A good, plain, unhurried breakfast is always important to the school child. The young are better off without coffee or tea; but some may need a warm drink for breakfast in cold weather—such as sweetened water, sugar and milk, and water or milk flavored with cocoa. If the child will not be at home and at dinner within five hours after the close of breakfast, have him to carry a small and easily-digested lunch to eat at recess or at an appointed time in school. It should be light bread and butter, with fruit or jelly and not overlarge if there is to be a meal at home by 2 o'clock. Have the child chew before swallowing, as it cannot chew after swallowing, as cows do. Let every boy know that tobacco in any form, is so injurious to growth and vigor as to make its use by him a breach of school laws and good sense. See that the child gets plenty of good sleep in a well-aired room, and does not go to bed just from the book, so as to be anxious about a lesson.

When a child is really unwell, do not send him to school, just for the name of being punctual. The parents should judge and decide wisely, mindful that the headache, pain, or weariness of a child requires rest. If your child is sick, or if there is sickness in the family, have the judgment of your doctor as to the time of staying at home.

TO THE CHILD.—In sitting, do not lean over too much or too constantly. While standing, stand erect. Neither fold the arms in front nor put them behind, but let them hang naturally and easily at the sides. In studying, try to have enough light without a glare. If lighter print troubles you tell the teacher. If you are really unwell, let him know it. A headache that may not require you to go home may be a reason for change of position or rest from study. Only be upright and do not pretend. In all things seek to take good care of your health, since your happiness and usefulness so much depends upon it.

Susan B. Anthony in England.

Mrs. Henry B. Stanton writes from London that Miss Susan B. Anthony arrived in England on March 6 after a particularly pleasant voyage. Miss Anthony left London to spend Easter in home, but before doing so she went to see Mr. Irving and Miss Terry in "Much Ado About Nothing." Next morning some one asked her how she enjoyed it. "It was so stupid I could hardly keep my eyes open," was her prompt reply. "Irving mouths the English language so that I could not understand a word he said, and what I did understand was not worth hearing, and he moves about in such a stiff way that one might imagine him just recovering from an attack of rheumatism. The only redeeming points to me were the beautiful scenery and the love making, which was cooler, more distant and more piquant than usual."

Very few people in this country ever heard of Lord Overstone, of England, who recently died, leaving a fortune of $50,000,000. Weston, the tramp was ever so much better known.

HOW SHE FOUND HIM.

It was on the last stage of the long and tedious ride from Fort Craig to Santa Fé. We had taken up the last relay of frisky mustangs, said good-night to the last sleepy hostler, and were dashing away into the darkness with the noses of the leaders pointed square toward the City of the Holy Faith. We had been under way an hour before my attention was attracted toward the driver. He might have been 15 and he may have been 75. He was cocked and primed with all the slang of the frontier, which he interlarded with bits of lingo from the mines, quaint quotations from the familiar poets and humorists, and when at a loss for a word or so to point a sentence slung in a Latin or Spanish phrase with an inimitable pronunciation and a graceful wave of the hand that signifies his utter disgust with a mother tongue that was so paltry of fitting words in an emergency.

"Now, let me tell you," he would remark close on the heels of some long and astonishing yarn; "now let me tell you what occurred to me one night on the Yellowstone," or the Brazos, or the South Fork of the Canadian, or the sea of Galilee, or other distant locality, and off he would gallop at a break-neck pace, keeping time with the scampering team in front of us. It was in the midst of this medley of astounding adventures by field and flood that he spun this quaint little yarn that is the excuse for these paragraphs.

"One night out from Los Animas," he began, after carefully lighting a proffered cigar, and shying the burning match at the offwheeler, "a beautiful moonlight night, you know, Cap, when the prairies seem all aglow with mellowness, I found when I had mounted the box and unfastened the lines from the handle of the brake, the strangest outside passenger in my experience It was a woman—that is, I thought her a woman when she drew herself up with dignity, as I bade her a hearty 'good evening,' and turned up her little nose at the idea of being accosted so familiarly by a driver, but when I said something about the night being filled with music, and the cares that infest the day, etcetra, etcetra, etcetra—you savez?—she turned a clear-cut, thorough-bred profile toward me and opened a pair of the biggest, blackest eyes I ever looked into with a most wondering expression. It was only a moment, however, for then she opened her lips to show two rows of the smallest, whitest teeth as she sent out a peal of childish laughter that rippled and rang all over the prairie.

"She had come from Boston, she told me, and was bound for Tucson, where she expected to meet a friend, 'the dearest friend in the world,' she intimated, with a proud little gesture, 'and he loves me to distraction. I am not alone, you know. Max is with me, and with him I wouldn't be afraid of anything. Would I, Max?' Now who the devil is Max I wondered, and looked up and down and all around, expecting to see some fellow, you know, that I hadn't noticed before. And just then I felt a cold, wet something coming against my cheek that felt for all the world like the barrel of a derringer, and turned around suddenly to see the biggest, blackest Newfoundland stretched out on the roof behind me.

"'And now let me tell you about Jack. You see Jack and I always loved each other. He was awfully mischievous, and when he grew up and we were married he was just as wild as ever, He got into some foolish scrape, and the people around there were all so stupid and intolerant that he could never have any peace of his life, and one day the sheriff came around to see Jack about something, and Jack didn't care to have any words with him, and so he went away. Don't you know I hadn't the slightest idea where he had gone for the longest time. But one day I got a letter from Chicago, and it was from Jack, and he had been having such a hard time, poor fellow, and he said if he only had some money he could go to the mines and dig lots of gold, and then come home, and we would be as happy as two bugs in a rug. Now, wasn't that nice of Jack? Well, so I had been saving up ever since he went away, I just sent him the money, and then I didn't hear from him again until about a week ago. Then a letter came from Arizona, and it was from Jack, and he had been having more trouble, and unless he could have more money within two weeks they would put him in jail. I can't understand why everyone is so down on Jack. So you see I drew all my money from the bank, and as I was afraid the mail might miscarry, I just thought it would be safer to bring it myself. And so here I am, and—and that's all. But won't he be glad to see me, the dear old darling, and won't it be splendid when I get there to face those wretches who are so down on him, and pay them their old, nasty money, and say, "There, you old rascals, I'm a little woman, as you can see, but I am Jack Seymour's wife." O, won't it be nice, driver?"

"Great God!" I thought. "Jack Seymour! the roughest desperado in the southwest and the biggest rascal unhung!" Jack Seymour's wife! She had better have been the wife of the old Nick himself. And then I happened to think that sure enough the sheriff had taken him a few weeks before, and that if Judge Lynch didn't try him in the meantime he would certainly swing by due process of law, and all the wives in the world wouldn't save him. I am afraid my face, even in the moonlight, must have shown something of my horror at the thought, for she peered curiously into it, and grasped my arm with a little clutch as she said: "Do you know Jack, driver? May be you have seen him. He is tall and fair, and his hair is ever so light, and curls all over his head in the cunningest little tight ringlets." Oh, yes, I groaned to myself, not the least doubt in the world but your man and mine are one and the same infernal scoundrel. But to her I said something altogether different, as you may imagine, and I did my best to keep up the conversation, and listened to all her queer little plans and confidences, and am afraid I forgot all about the truth in listening to that merry little voice as it chatted all night long to plumb daylight.

"A half hour after sunrise we drove into the little ranch where we were to change horses and breakfast. I noticed a crowd around the relay-house long before we reached it; say a dozen men armed to the teeth, and horses all saddled, as though a party had been staying there over night and were about to start on. But you can imagine how the blood curdled in my veins when, as we drew up in front of the piazza, two men with drawn revolvers came out of the door, and between them was a tall, fair man, with blue eyes and curling hair, and wearing the most dare-devil expression I ever witnessed. It was the Sheriff's posse taking a prisoner to Santa Fe. And just at that moment the Newfoundland made one spring from the roof of the coach to the piazza, and a ringing voice shouted: 'Why, that is my Jack!' and my little woman made one flying leap to the ground, with a glad-like cry that I shall never forget to my dying day, and then I saw Seymour struggling with his guards, heard muffled oaths, saw him wrench a revolver from the belt of one of them. 'Stand off!' he shouted. 'Stand off, men, or I will have some one's heart's blood! Stand off, I say!' Then I saw the burly Sheriff advance toward him, when, quick as a flash, Seymour leveled and fired square at his head. But the Sheriff had dodged; and as my little woman had been trying all the time to reach his side the cruel bullet struck her full in the breast, and she fell forward just as Seymour sprang and caught her in his arms. Then we all gathered about them as she lay there with her little white arms around his neck, talking to him in her sweet little voice while the anguish on Seymour's face was terrible to witness. How he cursed and imprecated his captors and petted and soothed the dying woman, and swore by all heaven that he would make all mankind pay dearly for that moment. And she,—the dear little angel—oh, shall I ever forget it?—she talked nothing but Jack. 'Never mind my darling,' she whispered, 'it was not your fault; you couldn't help it, you see, and I am so sorry that you are taking it so hard Jack. Never mind sweetheart it will soon be over. And, Jack,—here she pulled his head down to hers and whispered with her last breath—'after I am gone look in my little satchel and you will find the money. It was to be all yours, any way you know; and I am glad I reached you in time,' and the pure, faithful little heart had ceased to beat. I could stand it no longer, Cap, and with tears streaming from my eyes, I sprang back on the box, and drove my team the next twenty miles at a dead gallop. What became of Seymour? Oh! he swung just the same. He had a score of murders against him you know, besides this, the last and worst of all. And speaking of murders, let me tell you of something that happened to me in Utah in '59." But though my driver galloped away all night with his everlasting adventures, I heard nothing, but the last words of Seymour's little wife, and for the next week I lived over in memory the thrilling story of how she met him.

A month later, while lunching at Menger's in San Antonio, with Gen. Armstrong, the then efficient chief of all the stage lines north of the Brazos, I happened to think of my quondom friend, the driver.

"A queer character, General,' I remarked, "that driver of yours at Santa Fe. Johnson I think is his name, Ben Johnson. A most remarkable fellow. Seems to have picked up a deal of information for a man of his sphere. Uses good language, you know; has many original ideas; rude sort of eloquence, pathos, and all that sort of thing, you know. And besides he is a most wonderful raconteur.

"Yes,' said the General musingly, "and the biggest liar this side of the Rocky Mountains. If Johnson ever told you anything for a fact, you can bet $10 to a cent that it isn't so. Why, that unprincipled scamp lays awake nights studying out yarns to beguile travelers on the box. Do you know, Carl, he once told me a cold blooded fiction about a woman and a dog that—"

"Pass the wine, General," I faltered; "never mind the woman and the dog, I dare say I have heard it before. What time do we leave for Concho?"—Washington Capital.

A certain Continental countess was interrogating her son's tutor on the progress young hopeful was making in his studies. "How gets on the viscount?" said she. "Wonderfully well, my lady; we are working hard at the sciences. The viscount is particularly well up in his chemistry." "Indeed, ah! then Henri, my child, do tell me what is dynamite?" "Pardon, madame," interrupted the tutor, "but now-a-days dynamite does not belong to chemistry. It is considered as a part and parcel of political economy.

He now lives in a house built of pine lumber, though when the senator and Mrs. Beck visited him last year he had only a log cabin plastered with mud, and with a clay floor. But it was so healthy there that Mrs. Beck, who was so ill before starting that the trip was delayed from day to day, got well and felt such redundancy of spirits that she took hold of the household matters and taught an Irish boy how to bake bread and do all sorts of cooking for the men on the ranch.

The following interesting anecdote appears in Mathilde Blind's recent biography. "After translations from Strauss, Feuerbach and Spinoza, and Westminster Review, George Eliot met George Henry Lewes, and began to write fiction at his suggestion. Her 'Scenes of Clerical Life' and 'Adam Bede' interested Mr. Blackwood so much that Lewes invited him to meet the author. No one was present at the dinner table besides Mr. Lewes, Marian and Mr. Blackwood himself. The dinner was an extremely pleasant one, but when it was over, the guest could not help expressing his regret that George Eliot himself should not have been present. 'Here he is,' said Lewes, introducing the quiet, low-spoken lady who had presided at the table."

RECOLLECTION OF THE RIVIERA.

I first saw Mrs. Wiener at the table d'hote of e Hotel des Iles Britanniques, at Cannes. rs. Wiener, though the name is now so familiar to me, still sounds queer. Weiner, be a foreign appellation, seems in my un-Ger a ears to go more comfortably with Madame. dame Wiener runs so much more easily. t she never would allow that—if "Frau" s withheld by her English friends, "then ase call me like one of yourselves," she uld say, "and not as if I were a Frenchoman."

We were about sixty at dinner that evening; the mixed company one sees at those nes hotels—a few nice people and a great ny nasty ones—a sprinkling of many nanalities, but the English heavily preponderng. Mrs. Wiener sat next to me, and on her er side was her husband. Greasy soup that disgrace to the finny tribe, loup de r, had not taken the edge off my appetite, I was looking forward with interest to the ree, which, under the promising title of ato de pigeons," bade fair to be an improvent on the previous dishes. I was, however, last to be served, and presently glancing t Mrs. Wiener I discovered that my chance obtaining any of the delicacy had vanished. dimensions, rapidly decreasing, had ched Mr. Wiener, and he calmly put upon plate all that remained—just enough for o people, as our host had apparently calcud. His wife seemed to consider this a t proper and natural proceeding; evoking a disgusted glance from "Ach," she said, "you must se that Dummie takes all the pigeon pie: so good for him!" So it might have ; but I thought that a little of it would been good for me too, after my long ney. I was speedily consoled, however; w roar of disappointment from "Dummie" all eyes upon him. Heedless of the pubattention, he engaged in a loud altercation h the German head waiter; one long, thin held a fork aloft in the air, upon which pised not a limb of savory pigeon, but a ck slice of cold mutton, and the other hand inted to his plate, upon which companion ces reposed. I did not understand the matic German which ensued, but what had ppened was only too plain: The pigeon had iten short, and cold mutton had been hastily stituted to eke it out.

In a few weeks the mixed society in the hotel broken itself up into little cliques. We, he nice people," as we fondly and exclusly called ourselves, had made the "nasty" ople understand that we did not want to ve anything to do with them; that we did not sire conversations with them in the garden. here, for the sake of the air and the sunhine, we often established ourselves with our ork and books; that we did not care to drive ith the wealthier of them in the smart carriages, of which, with Delpiano's permission, ney were the possessors for the season; in act, that even salutations on the staircase were ot agreeable to us.

But Mrs. Wiener set those unspoken rules defiance. We all adored her, and, making uch of her, would have kept her to ourselves "But I am not Sevres porcelain like you are," she said to me one day; "I am only a homely little bit of Delft."

We used to have little tea-parties in one another's salons in those days. I am told that Cannes has now greatly altered, and the society having become like that of a large city, has affected even the hotels; but in the time of which I am speaking it was a sociable, cou trifled sort of a place, and a little scandal at afternoon tea, or at a quiet luncheon party, was our principal excitement.

One afternoon a few friends were sipping my orange-pekoe, "Dummie" and Mrs. Wiener among the number. By the way, I have never to this day discovered why she called him Dummie. Wilhelm was his name. He was a tall, slight, dark man, very delicate, rather good looking, and entirely absorbed in taking are of himself.

Miss Reynolds—a stout, solemn girl of sixeen, who seemed to look upon life as made for racticing, and who for eight hours a day teadily plodded through right-hand scales, eft-hand scales, scales with both hands together, five-finger exercises and shakes, to the torture and despair of her neighbors—had just risen from the piano, where she had accompanied our conversation for the last quarter of an hour with a dreary sonata. There was a pause for a moment—one's little remarks always flow so much more comfortably under the shelter of music—when Dummie turned to me and said:

"You should ask my wife to sing."

"I shall be delighted," I cried, "and I would have asked her long ago, but I had no idea that Mrs. Wiener sang."

"Oh yes," she answered, "I sing very well, indeed—but not much now, for Dummie does not always like it. I will fetch my music." And off she ran, returning in a few moments with an armful. "I will sing you a Swedish love song," she said.

The other day that Madame Nilsson was to a chill may take him from me, who love him so dearly. Every summer we go home to a little apartment in Dresden, and every autumn when the leaves begin to fall we come south like the swallows; sometimes to Algiers, sometimes to Madeira, sometimes to Nice—wherever Dummie fancies."

"And you," I asked, "how do you like such a wandering life?"

"Oh, for myself, there is nothing I should like so much as to live quietly in one place with Dummie, and to have kind friends about us. I should love to have a house of my own, and I would take such pride in having everything so neat and nice! I am a regular old housewife at heart. But that can never be. All I think of is how to keep my dear husband with me; and it is always before my eyes that one day I shall be left alone. But I never let him see that, for the doctors say everything must be bright for him; bright sunshine, change of scene, and always a bright companion."

And so she always was a bright companion; it was not often that she spoke as she did to me that afternoon. She was generally occupied in amusing Dummie, in one way or another. It was very funny to see them together; he made me really cross with him, he seemed so ungrateful; but no one could help laughing, all the same.

"And I like you when you laugh," he remarked to me one day; "you make nice big eyes. You are not like Mala. She screws hers up when she laughs, and with her white eyelashes they look such ugly little slits!" Which comparison Mala did not in the least resent, but looked upon it as an excellent joke.

At Easter I had a great pleasure. My nephew arrived in Cannes to spend a month of his leave with me; I was then, as now, so proud and fond of him. I don't think I have ever seen a handsomer young fellow; perfectly made, with regular features, bright, china blue eyes, and yellow hair and mustache. His adoring aunt and godmother took leave of her senses where he was concerned. Glad though I was to have him with me, I was much exercised in my mind as to how to amuse him. Young men from a crack cavalry regiment were rare in that manless region, and so were their pet occupations, too. Little excursions to Nice and in among the Alpes Maritimes seemed very small excitements to offer Charlie; and I did not urge him to frequent Mont Carlo, having an old maid's horror of gambling. But to my intense delight the dear boy took most kindly to all my little ways of passing the time; he declared that the mere transition from bitter East winds and frosts—for Easter fell early that year—to blue sky and steady sunshine, made existence a pleasure; that my little donkey trips among the pine clad hills were the jolliest picnics at which he had ever assisted, and that the quiet evenings in my comfortable salon, to which my friends were welcome, were all that he cared for after a day spent in the open air.

I had frightful misgivings, when he had been with me a few days, about a young Dutch countess staying with her mother at the hotel. She was a very handsome girl and most amusing; she and Charles struck up a desperate flirtation from the moment they struck eyes on one another. My first thought was one of delight. "She will help me to make Charlie's visit a pleasant one," I said to myself, and accordingly invited Mlle. Van Baerle to join our little party upon all occasions. But I soon repented me of my rashness. The fair countess was clever and most accomplished; a perfect linguist like all her nation, and a jolly good-tempered girl; but her fastness, and her truly awful knowledge of the wickedness of the wicked world, and her mad love of excitement at any cost! I shuddered as I thought what might be the consequence of my carelessness, and pictured my sister's distress if such a daughter-in-law were presented to her. Then I tried my best to drop her out of our plans; but with no success. I had been too gushing at first to be able to disengage myself all at once. My dear Mrs. Wiener, however, consoled me.

"It is nothing," she said. "It is much too noisy a flirtation to be serious. Why, yesterday evening he ran all along the corridor with her in his arms, because she said she did not believe he could lift her. They are two great romps, and if your nephew were really in love he would be more serious."

"I don't know," I sighed despondingly. "Charlie is never very serious about anything. Just look at them now."

They made a pretty, if to me a provoking, picture. We had been picnic-making on the Croix des Gardes, and now, after luncheon, were sitting about on the big stones under the pines, luxuriating in the air and magnificent view. Mademoiselle Van Baerle and Charlie were a foreground worthy of the landscape behind them. They were coquetting about a bunch of violets that she had been wearing at her neck all the morning. He, half-kneeling, half-sitting on a boulder of rock at the edge of the slope, was stretching up his hand for them; she, standing above, was holding them over his head.

Suddenly the rock against which he was leaning gave way, and poor Charlie turned a complete somersault before my startled eyes.

"No bones broken," he laughed, as he picked himself up; but his foot had had a nasty wrench, and he had to endure all the unpleasant consequences of a sprained ankle.

I think it was only then that I realized Mrs. Wiener's wonderful tact and sweetness, much as I had liked her before. She was so good to my poor boy. Of course, one may say that it does not require much virtue or self-sacrifice to be kind to a good-looking young fellow laid upon the sofa; but it was the way in which she helped to make his imprisonment bright that struck me. A long apprenticeship to Dummie had taught her a thousand little arts to while away the time; she never went out even for a solitary walk without bringing home some amusing story of what she had seen or heard; all the jokes and riddles of Europe seemed at her fingers' ends, and yet there never was such a sympathetic listener—the most halting story appeared witty and pointed when told to her. Her charming singing, too, was a constant pleasure; and Schumann's love songs, Grieg's strange melodies, and Gounod's wonderful harmonies brightened many an hour. Our favorites were those lovely ones of Schumann's in which he tells the story of a woman's life from the moment when she first sees her love, through her courtship and marriage, until the day when her husband lies dead before her. But this last one Mrs. Wiener never sang. Dummie, strange to say, did not at all appreciate his wife's music.

"I have too much of it," he remarked upon one occasion when she, on being asked to sing, looked to him for permission. A most unjust observation of Dummie's, for it was only in his absence that she gave us our musical treats.

Mademoiselle Van Baerle was also unremitting in her attentions to Charlie, and my anxiety on that score was not allayed. Since he was no longer able to romp with her she change her tone a little and plied him with sentiment.

"I think there are no men like Englishmen," I heard her murmur to him one day; "the Dutchmen are so heavy and slow—one has always to be stirring them up, and Frenchmen see that I will not have my salon used as a public sitting room."

"Now, auntie, you will do no such thing," cried Charlie; "I will not have you rude to her because he is a beast; she never said anything nasty. She is only too good to every one, and if I could only see her taken care of and made much of, as she deserves, instead of being a regular slave to that lazy brute, I should go away with a lighter heart."

"Go way, Charlie!" I exclaimed. "What do you mean? When are you thinking of going?"

"To-morrow," answered Charlie, firmly.

"But your foot?"

"Oh, my foot is all right; right enough to travel, at least. And it is quite time for me to go. You've been awfully good to me, aunty, but the sooner I get away from here the better."

Any further remonstrances of mine were interrupted by a knock at the door, and Mrs. Wiener entered. She did the only thing that could have made me quite forgive her the innocent share she had had in Dummie's remark. She went straight to the point and proposed a rubber of whist that evening, "for Dummie would like it so much."

"Delighted!" cried Charlie. "And you must give us a song afterward, for this is my last evening; I'm off to-morrow."

"Are you really? So soon? We shall be so sorry to lose you," she answered sweetly, but to my attentive ear a little indifferently. It jarred on me, for I saw the wistful look in my poor boy's blue eye. But, indeed, I had often noticed that feature in her character; that while charming to all, she really did not care for any one much except her husband. Her love for him seemed to absorb all the affection of her nature, and her wandering life, full of short friendships and quick partings, had perhaps intensified this her natural disposition.

And so our pleasant little party was broken up. I did not stay long after Charlie's departure, but said good-bye with great regret to sunny Cannes, then looking so lovely in its spring garb, the air laden with the scent of the orange blossoms, and every garden and meadow bright with flowers.

I did not at all like parting with Mrs. Wiener; I had grown very fond of her during our winter sojourn together, and the uncertainty of ever seeing her again made me doubly sorry to leave her. She promised to write to me, "Not often though; you will not expect it? for you know how difficult it is for me to write an English letter, and what a long time it takes me. But just now and then, to let you know how Dummie is and where we are spending the winter." And exactly as she made the promise she kept it. For seven years I heard from her; then one winter there came no letter; and toward the spring I saw in the paper the announcement of the death at Mentone of Wilhelm Wiener, aged forty years.

I wrote immediately to her Dresden address to express my sympathy, and after some months received an answer, in which she told me briefly about his last days. The end had been quite painless. Then she said, "I had talked it over with him many times that it one day would come to that, and I was prepared; but you can understand it is always too soon when we have to part with the dearest we possess. I have much to be thankful for, and yet the best of all is missing. But I try not to get gloomy, and I lead a very nice, quiet, home-like life here with his near relations, who are all so good and kind to me."

* * * * * *

Charlie, who in these eight years has wonderfully altered, changing from a bright boy to a quiet, reserved man, talks about making a German tour next summer. He asked me the other day, in the most casual manner, for Mrs. Wiener's address, as he thought he would call on her if he happened to pass through Dresden. I gave it to my poor boy, but I know full well that it is no use his going to Dresden. She will cling all her life to her dead husband's memory, and will end her days in his birthplace and among his people.

MY STEERAGE GIRL.

Oh, beauty in squalor, in dirt and rags!
Oh, ugliness hidden in velvet and lace!
There's an eye, sometimes, that the covering drags
From the prisoned glories of form and face.
Then diamonds glow in the humblest tears—
Then fades the grace of the papered curl;
And then I look back through the misty years
And think again of my steerage girl.

I found her one day in the motley crew
Of the steerage berths in a packet ship—
Where faces with hunger were gaunt and blue,
And suffering murmured in eye and lip.
A greasy candle, with sputtering wick,
She held at the ladder, lighting me down—
The grime on her round cheeks gathered thick,
And little bare feet of a dirty brown.

Such wondrous tints in her golden hair—
(It was matted and tangled and crazily wild)—
Such flashes of white in the bosom bare—
(Remember, O prude, she was only a child!)
Such a rosebud mouth! such a rounded cheek!
Such springing graces of simple form!
What a heaven of bliss did they all bespeak
When a year or two more should ripen and warm!

Alas! For I lost her! Was it a loss
To her or to me? We parted there.
But a moment joined—our fates ran across
When I mounted again the rickety stair.
Whatever had destiny ordered below
For my steerage beauty, I sadly missed.
Lost angel of squalor! I do not know
If she ever was washed, or ever was kissed!

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

How to Cook an Old Hen.

Matthias Williams tells in his Chemistry of Cookery how to cook an old hen in these words: I killed a superannuated hen—more than six years old, but otherwise in very good condition. Cooked in the ordinary way, she would have been uneatably tough. Instead of being thus cooked, she was gently stewed about four hours. I cannot guarantee the maintenance of the theoretical temperature, having suspicion of some simmering. After this she was left in the water until it cooled, and on the following day was roasted in the usual manner, i. e., in a roasting oven. The result was excellent; as tender as a full-grown chicken roasted in the ordinary way, and of quite equal flavor, in spite of the very good broth obtained by the preliminary stewing. This surprised me. I anticipated the softening of the tendons and ligaments, but supposed that the extraction of the juices would have spoiled the flavor. It must have diluted it, and that so much remained was probably due to the fact that an old fowl is more fully flavored than a young chicken. The usual farmhouse method of cooking old hens is to stew them simply; the rule in the midlands being one hour in the pot for every year of age. The feature of the above experiment was the supplementary roasting. As the laying season is now coming to an end, old hens will soon be a drug in the market, and those among my readers who have not a henroost of their own will oblige their poulterers by ordering a hen that is warranted to be four years old or upward. If he deals fairly he Margaux with the chill off, and good coffee well made. Most people, after this, will be in a genial mood when they reach the drawing room, and will be ready to be entertained and be entertaining.

The little dinner is, if well done, a bright and cheerful episode in our life. But if it is not in the power of the mistress of the house to have it well done, she had better leave it alone. When I say well done, I by no means intend that it must be a cause of great expense to the giver. It will be found quite possible, with good care and good management, to have a faultless little dinner, which both entertainer and entertained will feel much brighter and better for, without the cost being at all beyond the means of the sort of people I am referring to. The great art of dinner-giving is never attempt more than your own staff can do well; have no dishes you have not proved your own cook can do, and let house, table, dinner, all show that every care has been taken by all concerned to make the little dinner a success. And if madam does ask her lord and master for a little more money for the month's bills, he knows he has something for it; and, feeling how much social enjoyment he gives and receives, he will not grudge the expense, but will hardly grumble at its not infrequent repetition.

Cashmere Shawls.

The reason why a cashmere shawl is not injured by water is that it was very thoroughly soaked before it left its native land. After one of these shawls is woven it is washed to rid it of the rice starch in which the thread is dipped after spinning, and in Kashmir the best place for this is thought to be a certain canal leading from the lake. Some ruins, in large limestone blocks, are lying on the washing place, and in one of these is a round hole about a foot and a half in diameter, and a foot in depth. In this the shawl is placed, and, water being poured over it, it is stamped on by naked feet for about five minutes, and then taken into the canal by a man standing in the water; one end is gathered up in his hand, and the shawl swung round and beaten with great force upon a flat stone, being dipped into the canal between every three or four strokes. This occupies about five minutes. The shawls are then dried in the shade, as the hot sun spoils the colors, and in ten days afterward the colored shawls undergo a similar process, but occupying less time. The white ones, after being submitted to the process, on the first day are spread in the sun, and bleached by water sprinkled over them. They then are again treated by the same process as the colored shawls, being stamped upon and beaten a second time, and then bleached till they are dry, and then for a third time beaten, stamped upon and finally sun-dried. In the second time of stamping soap is sometimes used, but is not good generally, and is never employed for the colored shawls, as the alkali might affect the hues. The "pine" or "river" pattern, as it is sometimes called in the United States, is said to be derived from the curves made by the river Jhelam before it enters the city, and the fool's cap or cypress-shaped ornament is an imitation of the jewel worn in the cap by the Eastern magnates. There are innumerable other patterns, but these are the favorites.

White Toilets.

Fashionable modistes in New York declare that not in years has the demand upon them for elegant white toilets been so great as during the present season. White silk tulles over princesse slips of white or tinted satin surah are very favorite toilets, and from these simple styles extend a bewildering variety of modes and materials formed of the "hueless hue" which are rich and beautiful beyond compare. Reception dresses and toilets designed expressly for New Year's day are shown, which are triumphs of artistic skill and rare beauty. One dress just completed and sent to Washington has a corsage and train of very rich white brocaded velvet. The skirt is of pearl white satin, embroidered over the entire front with flower buds and ferns, all in pearls and crystals, and caught up as it meets the train at the left side with a long garland of pure white roses and foliage. For ball dresses are imported fine white silk nets, dotted with white chenille pompons about the size of a silver five cent piece. The effect of this diaphanous material, made up over white silk, is very charming and girlish-looking. Opera dolmans and circulars are made of white velvet, trimmed with white Zibliuette, with opera hats to match, and for bridesmaids' wear are shown some very pretty close-fitting French white felts, smooth and soft as velvet, trimmed with white feather trimming, with silver-powdered aigrettes and buckles of old paste.

Mid-Winter Dress.

Mid-winter fashions are very handsome this year. So many materials are used, and so many different styles are fashionable, that no one can complain of not being able to dress becomingly. There are the rich Persian mixtures in silks and woolen goods for ladies of nondescript complexion, and the clear blues, greens, crimsons and old gold for the blondes and brunettes. Then, tailor-made dresses are becoming to almost every one, whether tall or short, stout or thin. In evening dresses any style is permissible as long as the dress is made with a train, and a corsage cut low, either decollete, square-pointed or triangular. Fur of all kinds is used extensively on walking costumes, whether of silk, velvet or woolen goods. The idea now seems to be toward rich and plain dresses rather than toward showy ones—that is, for street wear—while the more bizarre a ball dress, the more fashionable. One of the most striking toilets worn at the Vanderbilt ball had a long square train of crimson velvet, hand-embroidered in deep double violets, and lined throughout with golden satin. The petticoat, which was entirely separate from the train, was a deep garnet satin, ruffled to the waist with flounces of duchesse lace, and caught up with clusters of natural violets. The bodice, of the velvet, was cut low, and made entirely without sleeves, the arms, neck and shoulders being bare. This was not the only dress cut in this style, and even New York people were greatly shocked at the fashion.

Tea Rosebuds.

New York Letter: "Say, old fel, have you heard about the new wrinkle of introducing girls?" said Mrs. Grundy, tapping me on the shoulder at the Union Square matinee. "At last people are getting a little sense, and snips of girls aren't fired at a lot of people in a ballroom for the first time in their lives. No, sirree, the new thing is an afternoon tea, at which the 'rosebuds'—that's what they call 'em nowadays—are brought out. This is the way it's done: The girl's mother invites two dozen of her old lady cronies to tea at 3 o'clock, and the miss is put at the head of the table and told to pitch in. She begins by pouring the tea with her left hand, while she arranges cups and saucers, and passes them with her right hand. If she in pale pink or blue, but she must never show herself in bright scarlets or yellows during her first season. Her flowers also must form a part of every ball dress. Pearls, sapphires and similar jewels must be worn in preference to diamonds. One of the prettiest debutante dresses made this winter was worn by a very pretty girl with brown eyes and yellow hair. It had a long train and bodice of white watered silk, which was covered with quantities of white tulle caught up by large beads to represent roses. The front of the dress was composed of puffings of tulle, each puff being separated by a string of pearls, while a long, white satin ribbon, tied at the lowest corsage fell in a bow to the floor. A rope of pearls was twisted in her hair, and a single string of them clasped close about her neck.

Mrs. Langtry's Presence of Mind.

Washington Letter: Her form is supple and every movement graceful. Even, in one scene in Peril, where she intended to fall fainting on a sofa, she missed the support and fell upon the floor, and in spite of the tightest of fitting corsets, satin bodice, long train and other incumbrances, she rolled over and over twice like a puff ball, and without the least disarrangement of a single article of her attire. Very few could perform such a feat, for the fall was hard enough to have knocked the breath out of an ordinary woman, but Mrs. Langtry is evidently an expert gymnast, for she, in answer to a call immediately after the accident, appeared before the curtain, which had dropped upon her as she lay full length on the stage after the fall and rolling over twice, and smiled as sweetly and looked as unruffled as a child would after such a performance. For a professional beauty, Mrs. Langtry is entirely devoid of self-consciousness. Her poses are natural, she does not rant, and really appears to lose herself in the character of Julia, in the delightful comedy of The Hunchback; Miss Hardcastle, in She Stoops to Conquer, and in an English adaptation of Sardou's Nos Intimes, under the name of Peril, in which she assumes the role of Lady Ormond. This is really her great character, and affords great scope for the fine lady, as well as one possessed of both weakness and strength. Mrs. Langtry is well supported in all her plays and in every character in the three plays.

About Colors.

No one can steer very far from the mark who wears her own favorite and most becoming color. For cloth, perhaps, refined taste chooses the dull shades of red and brown, but all colors are worn from these to the doves and grays that found such quick favor at the first of the season. There is some truth in the proposition that to be fashionable in this respect requires a little patience. Why? Because, at the first of the season, when some one color comes to the front, as grey did this fall, in such superabundance of shades and tones, there is danger of its running itself into disfavor by becoming entirely too commonplace through its universal adoption. Or, if not suited for the requirements it is called to fill, it subsides into a secondary role, and those who have taken it up too lavishly find to their discomfort, later in the season, that like many a man of business, they have invested too much capital in one line of stock. The color called "Titian red" is often confounded with a brown termed "tawny," and also with one known in former years as "Bismarck." Really, it should be applied to an auburn, as it derives its name from the great master artist who was accustomed to paint his saints and angels with locks of that deep, but sunny, hue.

Skating Suits.

There is no end to the variety of skating costumes worn this season. Some of the suits are very costly and unique, and our rinks and ponds present an animated picture of gay colors and novel styles. Whole costumes are made of crimson India cloth trimmed with fur bands ten inches deep, with very deep coachman's capes to correspond. A very stylish costume lately worn was made of silk plush; the short underskirt was in broad stripes of crimson and gold. The marquise coat of plain crimson plush opened over a vest of gold color richly embroidered. Both coat, apron, and tunic were trimmed with bands of dark brown fur, with cap, muff, and deep cuffs to match.

New Fans.

Handsome new fans in oval shape have appeared. One is made wholly of downy white feathers pure as snow, and in the center of the fan is snugged a large tropical bird whose brilliantly colored feathers, in scarlet, green, and gold, show most effectively against the milk white ones. On the heart of another white feather fan is set a bird's nest made of gold wire intricately woven, and inside the nest are three tiny pearl eggs. The pearl handle at the top is tied with long loops and ends of white satin ribbons. A less expensive fan made of black feathers with ebony handle, is finished in the center with a large cluster of scarlet velvet japonica.

Round Hats.

Most of the round hats this season are in English style, with ample crowns broad and flat on top, instead of peaked as formerly. The brims taper short at the back and project over the hair in front, or roll close to the crown all around. Stylish half high turbans, which were found so becoming to oval faces last season, are retained for winter wear, and are trimmed with close smooth feathers in "heather" mixtures, or with ostrich bands and scarfs of soft royal, in bright Roman colors, twisted into a graceful knot on one side and caught with a handsome buckle of cut steel or Roman gold.

Fashion Notes.

Bare arms and necks are again displayed by the latest cut of French evening bodices. Consequently costly necklaces of diamonds, pearls and other rare gems are in great demand. One jeweler in Union Square recently, New York, sold ten diamond necklaces of rare value in one afternoon to various persons; each necklace to be a holiday gift to sweetheart or wife.

New walking dresses from Paris show the short skirts covered with ruffles, cut into vandykes at the edges and bound or faced with satin or velvet. Above this is a very long apron overskirt caught up high at the sides, with buckles or wide ottoman ribbons. The overskirt is not trimmed, but simply hemmed. The edges of the bodice are cut to match those of the flounces.

A very pretty yet simple reception bonnet can be made out of a yard of white lace nine inches wide. Gather the lace in a circle and sew on to a frame made of white satin or silesia, leaving the edge of the lace to fall prettily on the hair. Place a cluster of narrow white satin ribbon on the crown where the lace is joined and tie with strings of white satin ribbon or of lace.

The newest handkerchiefs have tiny plaited ruffles about the edge, embroidered in flowers in their natural tints. Many of them have tucks inside the ruffle or bands of embroidery. Some of the handkerchiefs have two ruffles, with tucks in between.

Slippers with pointed and turned-up toes are popular. Those of calf skin with the hair on are pretty and warm, but are only worn in the house.

THE GREAT PAPER OF PARIS.

A Sketch of the Famous Figaro, the Sole Representative of Newspaper Enterprise on the Continent.

Some Account of the Men Who Make It, and a Glimpse at the Inside Workings of the Establishment.

PARIS, Special Correspondence, Dec. 6.—A little less than thirty years ago a newspaper was established in this city on a capital of $360, which cleared last year a net profit for its stockholders of more than $500,000. I refer to Le Figaro, which on the continent holds the same position that the London Times does in the United Kingdom, and that the Boston Herald and New York Herald do in America. Hippolyte de Villemessant came up to Paris from the village of Blois in 1839 and entered upon journalism two years later as a reporter, signing his articles in the Presse with the pseudonym of "Louis de Saint-Loup," the name of his grandmother. There was then, as now, an advertising agency, Dolligen & Co., and it was the head of this firm, who, in 1854, with De Villemessant, established a journal which has since become a power throughout the world. No newspaper is bolder, no editorial staff comprises more talent, no paper is more often quoted, none is more frequently praised or more often blamed than this same great daily of the Rue Drouot. It had its earlier struggles, its years of poverty before it became rich and influential, but there were enterprising men in the office and it achieved final success. Of this success the following anecdote is a proof: During that second reign of terror called the commune, M. de Villemessant took refuge in Switzerland. One morning he discovered that he had very little money, and wishing to cut down his expenses, discharged his valet de chambre, after having paid him his wages with four shares of stock in the Figaro. These shares had each a face value of 500 francs, but they were probably not worth more than half that sum. Well, those four shares are still in the family of the ex-valet de chambre, and they are now worth 32,000 francs. They pay 12 per cent per annum, and have been doing so for a good while on that amount. The paper began to pay well after the war with Germany. In 1872 the profits were 650,000 francs; in 1882 it cleared 2,560,138 francs. M. de Villemessant was a born journalist, one of the three grand and powerful workers which the French press has produced. The first was Bertin, the oldest of that name, who founded, at the dawn of the Revolution the Journal des Debats. Forty years later came Emile de Girardin. Of an active nature and a bold innovator, he founded a new school of news-gathering, which rapidly became popular. Then came De Villemessant, who, after numerous attempts, discovered a new sort of journal—a lively, brilliant, attractive sort, with its own individual stamp and personality—the journal of the boulevard, which under his skillful personal management became the powerful organ that it is to-day. He had a passion for journalism and a love for his paper. The Figaro was the great work of his lifetime, and his last words were about the management of the Figaro. In April, 1879, after a long and painful illness, he breathed his last at Monte Carlo. For years he had never failed the first thing in the morning when he awoke to unfold his paper, glance rapidly over it to see about the "make-up," and then he read every article in it from beginning to end.

NAMING HIS SUCCESSORS.

Dying, he determined that Francis Magnard, A. Perivier and Fernand de Rodays should collectively be the power which should carry on his ideas in the Figaro office. In fixing on these gentlemen De Villemessant wished above all things to leave behind him on the Figaro something which would take the place vacated by his death. He was at one and the same time reporter, editor in chief, and business manager, and he now found it necessary to detail off this work to those who would survive him. Having designated them by name, his last words were, as they stood in tears around his bedside:

> My friends, it is you who are now going to hold the handle of the stove. Always make up the paper as though you knew I were going to read it the next morning.

M. de Villemessant builded well when he placed this triumvirate in charge of the journal, and the stockholders have never had occasion to regret their appointment. The editorial department belongs, as a matter of right, to M. Magnard. He commenced his journalistic career, so to speak, in the paper of which he is now the editor. He was the first to establish the column headed "Paris from Day to Day" (Paris au Jour de Jour), which is made up of many small articles in the shape of condensed matter from the other newspapers of the day before, thus giving the reader a chance to know what is being said by other journals, and the situation of the various political parties. Generally half a dozen lines, hardly ever more than a "stickful," these articles are the quintessence of common sense, and as examples of condensation are quite the equal of anything that ever came from under the pencil of the famous Dr. Wood, so long a part and parcel of the New York Sun. Some years before the death of his chief Mr. Maynard filled the post of secretaire de la redaction, a position very similar to that of managing editor. Whenever M. de Villemessant was away the whole responsibility of getting out the paper devolved on Magnard, and he thus showed his capacity for the work which he was subsequently called on to perform. Beside this important and complicated task of managing the paper, M. Magnard, rarely allows a day to pass without writing his opinion on passing events in a short, clear leader, which, judging from a French point of view, is certainly an editorial gem. In a paper like the Figaro, read by so many different kinds of people, it is no easy matter to print a political article without giving serious offense. Claiming to be independent, the Figaro is quite conservative in its political views, although as a matter of fact I believe it to be in favor of a monarchy rather than a republic. A hard worker, a skilled journalist, a man of known honesty of conviction, a frank, honorable and amiable gentleman is this same editor of the Figaro. I should guess him to be about forty-three ners are cordial; and he deserves the popularity he enjoys in the profession. He speaks several languages, is a splendid fencer, and one of the few Paris journalists that is not ashamed to be courteous to a newcomer. He thus showed himself kind to me, and I beg to be permitted to thank him for it in this public manner.

THE BUSINESS MANAGER.

The third member of this triumvirate is M. Fernand de Rodays, the business manager. Like his two colleagues, he began on the editorial staff of the paper whose financial interests are now entrusted to his care. His first contributions were a series of witty and sarcastic "Portraits of the Prefets of the Republic," which gave him no little reputation and greatly annoyed those in authority. He then became the law reporter, and later was charged with the legal business of the paper. While especially charged with the business management of the paper, M. de Rodays takes an active interest in all that concerns it. He never fails to consult M. Magnard and M. Perivier whenever any important question arises in his department, and they invariably ask his opinion on all matters connected with the editorial interests of the Figaro.

M. Magnard has a private secretary in the person of Mr. Diguet, holding a position similar to that of city editor, and who in the absence of M. Magnard and M. Perivier has charge of the office and sends the paper to press. There are about twenty-four regular cases in the Figaro composing room, but they are not all on the same floor. There are four proof readers and a man who has charge of the book, one on each floor. The pages are made up on a flat stone, and are stereotyped in the basement at one end of the press room. There are four Marinoni presses, each one of which can run off 15,000 to 20,000 sheets per hour. There are no folding machines in the establishment, and the printed sheets are carried by hand from the "fly table" up four or five flights of stairs to a large room, where they are folded by fifty women. Thence they are carried down again to the city carriers and to the carts for the postoffice and railways. The circulation averages 80,000 to 90,000 daily. I don't know what M. de Rodays charges the dealers for them, but we pay three cents five times a week, and four cents on Wednesdays and Saturdays, when there are supplements, and I have been told by the kiosque people that they have to sell six copies in order to make three cents, and are not, as a rule, allowed to return any unsold copies. According to the contract between M. Marinoni and the Figaro company all the mechanical labor is attended to by the former. He takes the copy, sets it up, composes the forms, stereotypes them, buys the paper, furnishes the presses, employs the laborers, and sends the journal into the market. Three presses are running every evening, the fourth being held in reserve in the case of an accident. When the paper is late in getting to press it is put to work also. There are very few events for which M. Cassigneul has authority to hold back; one of these is on the occasion of a first night at one of the theaters. Mr. Auguste Vitu is not only a distinguished litterateur, but he is also a critic of great weight and much experience. He is paid 20 cents a line for his articles; they are usually long, and his income from the Figaro is a handsome one. Most of the editors on the Figaro gain large incomes. The editor in chief, including his share in the profits, receives about $28,000; M. Perivier and Mr. de Rodays, who also share in the profits, receive about $24,000 each. The salaries of the editorial staff range from $2,500 to $10,000 per annum. Special articles are generally paid for by the line, 3, 6 and 10 cents per line, according to contract. M. Albert Delpit writes an article every week, a column and a half long, for which he receives $40.

AS A NEWSPAPER.

The Figaro is not always a newspaper in the sense of the term used in American journalism, and yet it displays more enterprise in the collection and printing of news than any other paper on the continent. Take it as a whole, it is a very satisfactory resume of European life, and in that expression I include England, which has never seemed to me to be a part of Europe. Politics occupies a very small space in the Figaro, and its columns thus freed from party essays are usually occupied by "chroniques," general articles, fancy sketches, novels, letters from foreign capitals, art criticisms, book reviews and clever theatrical sketches. Very eclectic, always hospitable, the Figaro reinforces its regular staff by a whole army of occasional contributors, and we are never surprised when we find in our morning paper a leading article on some current topic signed by some one of the best known names in literature. I doubt if there is another paper in the world which pays the principal members of its staff such princely salaries as does the Figaro; there are only a few journals in existence which equal it in the expenditure of money in the matter of foreign correspondence or the sending of its representatives long distances to report big events. It is a paper which is appreciated everywhere. It is to be found in nearly every quarter of the globe. Without exception, it is the most cosmopolitan journal in existence. It instructs, it entertains, it amuses. Its epitome of the news of other countries may sometimes be a day or two late, but it is always well chosen and skilfully arranged. Its reports of fashionable events, of the turf, of the new plays and operas, are always well written, and often prepared in such a seductive way that the whole town is set a talking by the pencil picture which some fa-

The chairman of the committee on public land asserts that over 100,000,000 acreas of land has been forfeited to the government on account of the failure of railroad companies to build roads according to the terms of the land grant acts. In some cases not a mile of road has been built. Forfeiture in such cases is unfortunately demanded.

As a remedy for divorce and for breach-of-promise suits, it is suggested by a contemporary that all marriage contracts hereafter be reduced to writing, and "sealed, signed and delivered" in the presence of witnesses. This is reducing matrimony to a business basis, which corresponds with "the most advanced view" of the subject, and if it is to be adopted it would be well enough not only to have witnesses to the written contract, but there should be bonds men required on both sides for the faithful performance of the arrangement.

The Mille Lacs band of Indians in Minnesota, having been reported in starving condition, Gov. Hubbard made the fact known to the Commisioners of Indian affairs and suggested that provisions be made for their immediate relief. The commissioners at once telegraphed an order to Agent Luce at White Earth to visit the Mille Lacs and relieve them. The rice crop of the Indians was a failure this year; they cannot sell hay because there are no loggers; deer are scarce, etc. These and other things have reduced them much below their usual precarious means of life.

A British statistician of recognized ability states that workmen in England receive 30 to 100 per cent. more in wages for 20 per cent. less work than they did fifty years ago. He then proceeds to say that while wages have advanced most articles of consumption have rather diminished in price, the change in wheat being especially remarkable and significant of a complete revolution in the condition of the masses. From official statistics he demonstrates that in longer life, in increased consumption per head of the chief commodities, in better education, in greater freedom from pauperism and crime, and in increased savings, the masses of the people are in an immensely advanced and improved position.

To show the benefits of good farming over poor, at a late meeting of the Missouri state board of agriculture, Prof. Sanborn stated, that on the same field, and with similar cultivation, he had raised one year 12 bushels of corn to the acre, and another year 100 bushels. The difference is so great as to warrant all the care and precaution that a farmer can give his crop, from the selecting of the seed to the gathering of the product; for while twelve bushels of corn per acre will keep a farmer poor, 100 bushels per acre will make him rich. As many as 150 bushels of corn per acre has been raised in the west, and one case is on record of 2.6 bushels to the acre. Of course it was not a large acre on which the great yield was obtained; still, it shows what can be done in corn raising, under the most favorable treatment. English farmers, by deep ploughing and careful manuring, set 40 bushels of wheat per acre from their soil, and it is said that Belgian farmers, by more minute and careful treatment, do a great deal better; they get 100 bushels per acre on their little two and three acre plats.

Socialism is something that is hardly understood in the United States, but it has obtained a foothold in some of the larger cities and is likely to gain adherents in hard times, and especially, if it is seen that the states and federal governments are controlled by capital and monopolists. What the socialists actually want may be considered as authoritively set forth by the national socialistic "congress" lately held at Baltimore which says: "That the resources of life—namely, land, the means of production, public transportation and exchanges—become, as fast as possible, the property of the whole people. We demand the entire revision of the United States constitution, to the end that a certain number of citizens shall have the right to propose laws, which proposition shall be referred to a popular vote, and all legislative enactments of congress, if demanded by a specified number of citizens, shall likewise be subjected to a general vote for their adoption or rejection: also that the officers of president and vice president of the United States and the United States senate shall be abolished, and instead thereof, a federal council established whose members should be elected by, and directly responsible to, the house of representatives. We demand that the right of suffrage shall be in no way abridged, and that there shall be political equality before the law of all citizens without regard to creed, race or sex. We demand the establishment of a national department of labor, which shall include a bureau of labor statistics. We demand that eight hours be accepted as a work day in all industrial employments, and the rigid enforcement of the eight-hour law in all national government works. We demand that the government alone shall issue all money, and such right shall not be delegated to any banking or other private corporation; also the right of legal incorporation by act of congress of all national trade and labor organizations." Of course everbody has the right to make such demands, but acquiescence by the people is quite another thing—and the people is the only source of power.

Washington News Notes.

The Washington Star says that Clarence M. Barton, for several years connected with different papers in that city, is missing and it is alleged he has left behind him a number of forged endorements on which he obtained money. Among the names said to have been forged are William N. Dickson, foreman of the first star route jury and Henry D. Boteler, a merchant. Gen. Brady's name is on some of the paper, but it has not been ascertained whether it is forged or not. The amount of fraudulent paper is unknown. Barton was night editor of the Republican when the affray took place between the Stoldo brothers and himself, which resulted in the death of the elder Stoledo.

Washington Special: Mr. Blaine came early and stayed with the president throughout the entire reception, and the president spent the evening at Blaine's house. Blaine, while he did not receive with the president, stood just behind him surrounded by richly dressed ladies, and he could not have been unconscious of the fact that he was the object of as much attention as the president himself. Blaine seemed particularly happy, and when at the end of the reception he went out into the east parlor and was at once surrounded by an admiring throng that almost hung upon his lips, he had a tribute to his popularity, or prominence, that was the subject of no little comment.

General News Gossip.

A Denver Special says: A lively free-fight between Slugger Slade of the John L. Sullivan combination and local celebrities, occurred in front of the Arcade saloon Wednesday morning. All hands were drunk, so no serious damage was done. An officer interfered, but was soon "done up." Others came to the rescue, and all hands were jailed. During the melee the Champion Sullivan ran into the American house and demanded a revolver with which to drop some one. Proprietor Smith refused, when Sullivan attempted to take it by force. Smith, however, revolver in hand, run him out of the house. If some of the slugging fraternity don't bite the dust before leaving Colorado they will be in luck.

Big Failure in Miles City.

C. W. Savage & Sons, general merchants at Miles City, assigned last Monday night to H. H. Mund, of Stebbins, Mund, & Co., bankers of this place, and A. B. Curry, formerly of St. Paul. Assets are about $30,000, made up of stock, $60,000, including the Livingston store; real estate in Miles City $25 000, including store property and some other town property; book accounts, $5,000. The liabilities will amount to about the same as the assets, and are composed of $30 000 due St. Paul and Minneapolis merchants, divided about equally; $11.000 due St. Paul banks and L. L. Stone; $24,000 due Stebbins, Mund & Co., bankers, Miles City, $25,00 due San Francisco parties, $3 000 due in Chicago, $3 500 due in Milwaukee, $6.000 due L. K. Stone next August and the balance scattering. The assignment was made because the firm believed some parties were about to press them, and while they were not in a critical condition if left alone, they were in no shape to be pushed, and rather that than a few should benefit and many suffer they decided to place their affairs in the hands of gentlemen whom they could trust and let all benefit alike. The assignment is general and prefers none. Every thing belonging to the individuals of the firm has been turned over to the assignee, who it is expected will open the store as usual.

Analysis of the Public Debt Statement for December.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Jan. 2.—The December debt statement issued to-day shows a reduction of $11,743,337 for the month—a large gain over last month's decrease, when it amounted to only $1,721,676. It was much less, however, than the reduction for December, 1882, when it reached $15,413,222. The decrease for the first half of the fiscal year, which closes with December, foots up $53,049,483, against $81,370,783 for the first six months of 1882. If continued at the present rate, the reduction for the entire fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, would be about $106,000,000; but this is not a safe plan of estimate, for although the first half of the last fiscal year showed a reduction of over $81,000,000, the total decrease for the fiscal year amounted to but $137,823,000. The estimate of the secretary of the treasury for the current fiscal year contemplates an appropriation of $45,816,000 to the sinking fund, and a surplus revenue in addition of $39,183,000, a total of some $85,000,000, to be applied to the extinguishment of the national debt; as the first half of the year has yielded about two-thirds of this amount, it is fair to expect that the net surplus at the close of the year will overrun the estimate somewhat. The available cash balance on hand appears to be $142,560,000, according to the statement. This is not the actual fact, to-day, however, for this morning the January fours and some Pacific railroad, interest on which has to be paid by the government, was taken out of the cash to the amount of about $8,000,000. So that in reality the available cash is down to about $134,000,000, or over $4,000,000 below the usual 40 per cent reserve. The statement for December, 1882 showed an available cash balance on hand amounting to $140,037,773. The receipts for the six months closing with December are of interest as showing the effect of the new tariff law. They show that the falling off has been about $26,500,000, indicating a decrease for the year of $57,000,000. The estimated decrease by the secretary of the treasury for the current year was $14,000,000.

Butler's Successor Inaugurated.

Gov. Robinson of Massachusetts was warmly welcomed on the 3d. inst., to the White House. Gov. Robinson in his address, asks for the more particular enforcement of the registration laws and biennial elections for State officers. He says on the labor question:

Adventurers and visionaries may try to set labor and capital in bitter hostility, stir up bad blood among citizens and divide all the people into envious and antagonistic classes, but they are only instigators of mischief and the greatest enemies to those whom they profess to aid. All statutes relating to hours of labor, employment and schooling of children, intimidation of laborers and kindred subjects should be strictly enforced. If they are not expressive of the judgment of the people, let their repeal come regularly.

The board of charities gets a kind word, and greater facility in obtaining dissolution of the marriage bond is censured. The enforcement is urged of laws existing relating to the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

Not Very Likely to Pass.

Mr. Knute Nelson, representative of Minnesota will introduce in the house a bill to establish the northern judicial district of Minnesota to be composed of the following counties: Big Stone, Traverse, Stevens, Grant, Douglas, Pope, Otter Tail, Wilkin, Clay, Becker, Norman, Polk, Beltrami, Marshal, Kittson, Benton, Mille Lacs, Morrison, Todd, Crow Wing, Kanabec, Pine, Wadena, Cass, Hubbard, Aitkin, Itasca, Carlton, St. Louis, and Lake.

The terms of court shall be held alternately at Duluth and Fergus Falls. At the former place the term will begin on the first Monday in July, and at the latter the first Monday of December of each year. The bill provides that the districts of Minnesota shall hereafter consist of the counties not mentioned in this act, and shall be called the southern district of Minnesota. The times for holding court in the southern districts shall be the same as at present.

Villard Steps Down and Out.

At the annual meeting of the directors of the Northern Pacific railroad, held in New York on the 27th inst., Villard addressed the following:

To the board of directors of the Northern Pacific Railroad:

I hereby offer my resignation as president of your board. I feel constrained to take this step for two reasons; one is, I am suffering from nervous prostration, which renders me no longer capable of properly discharging my official duties, and my physicians advise absolute abstentation from all active employment as a condition of the recovery of my health. The other reason is that, in my own opinion, no less than in that of my personal and business friends, the interests of the company call for the severence of my connection with it. It is a sad reflection that such should be the unjust result of years of severe labor and consuming anxiety which I have spent in my endeavor to serve the company conscientiously and to the best of my ability. But my feelings shall not stand in the way of the welfare of the stockholders. I am consoled by an abiding confidence that the future will completely vindicate all I have done. I may, as soon as my health permits me, ask the privilege of submitting to you a summary of my administration of the company's affairs. Allow me to express to you in conclusion, my sincere thanks for the cordial support and appreciative sympathy you have at all times extended me.

The directors adopted a resolution complimentary to Villiard and voted him $10,000 a year for his services during the time he was president of the company. The election of President has not yet taken place but private advice say that the new regime will be.

Thomas F. Oakes, president and general manager.

Adna Anderson, general superintendent and chief engineer.

J. T. Odell, superintendent of transportation for the whole line.

Mr. Oakes is at present vice president and acting general manager, Gen. Anderson is chief engineer, and J. T. Odel is assistant general manager for the Eastern division.

By a trust deed recorded on the 4th inst., in the surrogate's office Mr. Villard transfers his magnificent new Madison avenue mansion to Horace White of New York and William Edicott, Jr., of Boston. The transfer is made to satisfy any indebtedness of Mr. Villard to the Oregon Railway & Navigation company, of which he recently resigned the presidency. The surplus, if any, after satisfying the company's claim, is to be paid to Mrs. Villard. Mrs Villard relinquishes her own right in the property.

Sad Condition of Villard.

A New York dispatch says that Mr. Villard is seriously ill. He begged to be excused from an interview, and referred the reporter to an intimate friend and adviser of his (Mr. Villard), who, he said, might, perhaps speak for him. This gentleman spoke freely, of Mr. Villard's position, and, as he said, with an intimate knowledge of the subject.

"Yes," he said, "the story you tell me of him is true—Mr. Villard is a ruined man in his private fortune. He hasn't as much money to his name to-day as you have. It has all gone to the help of the great enterprises he has been at the head of. There can be no question of his conscientious integrity, for he has voluntarily sacrificed his private means to support the Northern Pacific. Mr. Villard deserves the sympathy of the public."

"Has he nothing left?"

"Absolutely nothing. His stocks, his bonds, his two fine residences are all involved in the wreck. He has saved nothing. He never was so rich a man as was reported. It was reported he was worth $10,000,000, but $5,000,600 would come nearer the figure."

"Did the rumored interview and reconciliation between Mr Billings and Mr. Villard take place?"

"Yes; last Sunday Mr. Billings called to see Mr. Villard. Mr. Billings, you know, had quarreled with Mr Villard, had resigned from the management of the Northern Pacific, and there was some ill feeling between the two.

The Central Iowa Refuses to Comply.

DES MOINES, Iowa, Jan. 4.—The Central Railway of Iowa has announced its intention to resist the power of the Iowa railway commissioners to compel it to comply with their recommendations. This refusal grows out of the complications arising in what is known as the Northwood case. The Central built its track to Northwood upon condition of a subsidy from the town, and several other towns in the county, which have been voted and paid by the people. Later the Burlington, Cedar Rapids & Northern projected a line in the same locality; and it, too, was voted aid. The last-named company built to Manley, twelve miles south of Northwood, where it formed a junction with the Central Iowa, and ran on the latter's track. This track was used jointly for a while, when the Central drew off its trains, and left the people of Northwood without the advantage of competing lines. Complaint was made to the railroad commissioner, and after a full investigation the board formulated an opinion declaring that the Central railway should comply with the conditions on which the aid was voted to it, and continue the operation of its tracks to Northwood. It is now announced that the company flatly refuses to obey the mandate of the commissioner.

Suicides in New York.

A mortuary statistician has been digging up the records of suicides in New York city from 1868 to 1882, and gives the result together with general particulars. During the period of fifteen years he finds recorded 2,176 cases of suicide in the metropolis. The increase was a pretty steady advance from 98 in 1868 to 199 in 1882. The ages of the suicides range from ten years to ninety, and the causes so far as they can be traced are chiefly love and money about equally divided. More women died by their own hands for love, and more men for money. The records explode the old theory that November, when the year begins to die, is the favorite month for suicides. The preference is given to midsummer.

John Proctor of Andover, N. H., a prominent millionaire, is dead.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—There was no disposition shown for trading, and the market generally was very dull. The shipments again exceeded the receipts—5,500 bushels of grain leaving the city, where 4,000 bushels came in. This circumstance, however, was not a factor in the market, and of no value whatever as affecting prices. No sales were recorded. Prices bid were: No. 1 hard, cash, 98c; February, 99c; March, $1; April, $1.01; May, $1.05. No. 2, 90c. No. 2 hard, 93c. No. 2, 82 and 83c.

Mr. Phil McLaughlin is evidently up on his ear on the subject of Irish grievances. An article appeared in the Tier a short time since in which the assertion was made that the lion's share of the O'Donnell fund went into the pockets of sleek Irish frauds. The article appeared as an editorial and was so taken by Phil, who, as there was nothing to the contrary naturally supposed the Tier man originated it, where upon Phil mounted his wild Irish charger and sailed in with blood in his eye. His letter was not couched in the choicest terms of the very best writers, grammatically or orthographically, but contained a sufficient amount of good common sense to entitle the writer to more consideration than to have his letter copied verbatim, ad literatim et spellatim, and held up as a subject of ridicule. Now we happen to know Mr. McLaughlin and to know that while he is as liable to error as any human being yet no honester or more loyal heart beats under a true Irish vest than Phil carries; he is, like every true Celtic patriot, generous to a fault and would go for miles in the biggest blizzard to do a noble and generous act of charity, or to oblige a friend and we object to the Tier's course in this matter and condemn it most emphatically. The Tier should remember that the Irish race is smarting under grevious burdens and occupies about the same position toward England as did the Colonies before the Revolutionary war, (if indeed not worse) and every true American heart to-day will and does beat in sympathy with them and will not add a stab to their already numerous wounds. No true American will sneer at them in their distress and then when they, feebly, it may be, but honestly it is, offer a remonstrance will hold them up to ridicule because they have not climbed the classic mountains as high as Daniel Webster and because they cannot throw in a whole dictionary into one short newspaper article. Who was Patrick Henry and the long list of Irish patriots, who by the accidents of birth and education rank among the peers of any man living? America is and always was the home of the poor and down-trodden of other lands and it is the boast of Americans that we have no slaves under our government. We can find much to commend in the fortitude with which the Irishman bears his wrongs and we heartily sympathize with him in his honest endeavors to cast off the shackles by which his race is to-day bound hand and foot and we can not find it in our heart to ridicule even he feeblest effort he may make in the struggle. His cause is a noble one His efforts do him credit and will result in his freedom if he continues true to his trust. Now, as to Phil's letter it was certainly quite intemperate in one particular and would not probably have been written if he had known that the item he referred to did not emanate from the editorial capacity of the Tier but was simply a "galvanized" editorial. Appearing as original, with apparently the sanction of the editor, he can not be blamed if he thought it was as it looked so he loaded up his gun in haste and blazed away, and his thoughts were so much faster than his pen that they ran away with it, consequently he blundered some, but the essence was all right and if he had omitted that somebody was a liar it would have been sound enough and temperate enough, when shorn of its rough edges. Phil is a good boy and true but the wrongs of his people are as the apple of his eye and we would rather risk a personal blow at Phil himself than a fling at his race; and right there is where he shows his true manhood and we can see no good reason to make fun of a man for an honest attempt at self-defense. He is worthy of more consideration.

EDITOR JOURNAL: Lend me your shouting apparatus, not your ears. I've not room for 'em, but in the opinion of your humble servant many important facts are being overlooked in the general warfare against the R. R and the M. M. A., for instance. Have you forgotten the attempt, and the vain one, the millers made last summer to get reduced rates or rebates from eastern transportation lines in order that they might compete with the Duluth market? They sent a committee of their honorable body to Chicago to confer with the railway magnates for this purpose. The St. Paul and Minneapolis papers were full of it at the time, and were loud in their wailings about the Duluth market. Is not this frozen wheat etc., business the other way for one year of getting even with it? I say one year for they even have a new kink every year. At the late meeting in Crookston a railroad to Duluth was the one object thought of and the question of bonding towns brought up, one that if ever is gone into will be as surely regretted. How far up in the bucket do you suppose would reach the few drops in the way of bonusses a comparatively few towns between, say, Grand Forks and Duluth could throw in towards an estimated $7,000,000. It is only throwing out bait to schemers, when the D. & W. R'y is built it will be by men that a few thousands cannot control, and why? Because that road, until the country is settled strikes no paying trade in the Red River Valley is reached and that would not be a paying freight on the whole line. It would be a long through haul, and but little local traffic and no feeders. It has got to be, when built, a giant monopoly and extend way beyond this valley, or else a weak affair to be gobbled up by the Manitoba Co., and then where are you, oh, suffering brethren? If a giant monopoly, Jim Hill, stands ready at every strategic point to get ahead of them and cut them off. In the above statements will be found good logic for the now building of the D. & W. but here old settler use the points of your digets upon your cranium and rake out old remembrances about the water route to Duluth. We used to discuss it in bye gone days It was, and is pronounced practicable by eminent men. The Duluth Chamber of Commerce under a committee prepared an elaborate report upon this subject a few years back and found it could be built for $4,000,000, and that was before the Government had made any improvements in damming the Mississippi for the Minneapolis lumbermen. We would now get the benefit of all the back water to overcome the elevation between Red Lake and Turtle River etc., If our congressmen attend to their fences properly they could get us an appropriation this winter for a survey and possibly commence active operations. Why not get up an inch or two of petition and send down. The Government Treasury is overloaded with dust, Jim Blaine proposes to distribute it out for internal improvements. Let's have Jim for President and let him cater to our capacious stomachs. This canal scheme has been the butt of considerable sarcasm but it has been pronounced entirely feasible. Boats could make the trip in five days from Crookston, on six feet of water, 6½ months each year, and take 20,000 bushels of frozen staff of life each trip, the rest of the year Duluth and eastern buyers would keep the market up to navigation rates. Think on it. Its worth promulgating any way. The writer merely throws this out as a feeler and hopes in the general discussion he will not get knocked out in the first round.

WADENA, Jan. 2d.—To the Editor: Would you allow space for a few words from a Northern Pacific farmer on this ever-present wheat question. There is no place where there has been more agitation over it than around Wadena. Just as sure as the fall came round, and farmers commenced to market their wheat, so surely did the excitement commence. For three months, as the season came round, it was the all-engrossing topic. Our local paper was kept primed with letters denouncing Minneapolis and other wheat rings, and unjust combinations of all sorts. There has been a change, however, this year. We have to a considerable extent settled this question here. Every farmer was satisfied there had been a leakage somewhere in the handling of his wheat, to something between the value of 5 and 10 cents on every bushel; and a few earnest men went around and got the principal farmers around here to pledge themselves to take stock in a farmers' elevator to such an amount. That is, each farmer pledged himself to give from five to ten bushels for every 100 that he sold. There were something over 2,000 bushels pledged, and a committee was appointed to correspond with the railway company. The committee in their communications were men in the most courteous and obliging spirit; but they were met by the same objections to a farmers' elevator as Manager Manvel of the Manitoba road used in his letter to the Pioneer Press. There was an elevator of 70,000 bushels capacity at Wadena already, and they couldn't allow another, unless it was of equal capacity. It was their duty, they said, to protect the capital at present invested on the road. We could attempt nothing to this extent, and the thing looked rather serious; but we thought we would try what a little combined pressure would do. We got up a large petition with the amount of grain each farmer raised placed under his name, and appointed a committee to go to St. Paul and lay it before the manager. The upshot was that the petition was granted. We were allowed to put up an elevator of 30,000 bushels capacity. The building of that elevator has been a hard pull. Manager Manvel had some grounds in stating that farms in general were too poor to build elevators to handle their own grain. I'm afraid, too, there are some who are not very willing to sacrifice anything to do it. We have our own story to tell of broken pledges. There are some notes for shares in the Wadena Farmers' Elevator Company lying around here for collection that could be got remarkably cheap. The elevator is now an accomplished fact, however. There has always been enough of good men, and true, to step into the breech and rally when any unexpected call was made on them, and it is now in the hands of a company that, I have no doubt, will make the farmers' elevator a prominent institution of Wadena. Now, seeing the fruits of our elevator—both in its material advantages, and the better feelings it has engendered—I would ask if they could not be more generally adopted. I don't believe, if the thing is gone about in a right spirit, that any railway company either would or could resist a combined movement of farmers for this purpose. As for the general public I think they can have no interest but in seeing the producer and consumer brought closer together. Legislation may do something for us; but God helps those who help themselves, and certainly the legislation of the future will be more easily applied if the farmer both raises the wheat and ships it to market. I know it has been a success in Wadena. The farmers' elevator has shipped about two-thirds of the wheat from here, and there has been no grievance heard of; and I do not—as far as the present system of dealing goes—see how there can be. A farmer can either ship his own wheat through the elevator, or take the price, barring the charges, that is going at home. One or two farmers, at the beginning of the season, tried a car load or two to see how it would go. Sometimes, in a rising market, they would catch a cent on two on the margin, and at other times, when it was falling, they would lose it; and farmers stopped shipping it altogether. I am afraid I have drawn this out rather too long, but I hope you will excuse it. We are hot on farmers' elevators around here, and seeing the fruits of our own, we will be glad to welcome any addition to the number.

Yours,

A WHISTLER AT THE PLOW.

The Big Talk.

It was announced early in the week that General Manager Manvel, C. A. Pillsbury and others would meet a number of our prominent citizens and farmers on Wednesday to talk over the wheat business with a view to adjusting and correcting the abuses which have crept in. At the appointed time a special containing Mr. Manvel, Mr. Pillsbury, Mr. Hurlbut, Mr. Sterritt and two Dakota wheat inspectors arrived and soon city hall was filled to overflowing with an eager audience anxious to see what could be done. Mr. M. R. Brown was called to preside who introduced Mr. Manvel who in a few words stated the reasons why he came and also stated that it was the earnest wish of the railroad company to protect the interests of the settlers. Mr. Pillsbury was then called who stated that the millers' association was making no big money out of their operations and that the elevator companies were making little or none in handling wheat. After which a few individual cases were presented showing wherein the farmers have been wronged but not over one in a hundred was presented. The debate was eager and earnest from 2:30 till 7 o'clock at which time the meeting broke up. At 8:30 the committee appointed by the farmers' meeting met Mr. Manvel and Mr. Pillsbury at the office of the railroad company and the discussion was continued until 12 o'clock. Mr. Manvel was perfectly free and frank in his remarks and we are led to the belief that he is perfectly sincere in his intentions to afford all of the relief in his power but he does not see the necessity of allowing a free and indiscriminate use of cars to every individual shipper (which to us seems impracticable) nor to allow merchants and others the privilege of handling their wheat through their own individual warehouses. He stated that in cases where the individual was refused a proper grade for his wheat and he could not obtain a bin in an elevator the company would give him a car to ship his wheat and also cited cases wherein he would allow farmers to build a wheat house on sidetracks. His remarks had the appearance of candor and fairness, leaving the impression that the company means to do all in its power to encourage the settler and to protect him in his business. Mr. Pillsbury stated that about five cents per bushel was the profits of the millers for grinding and he also said that the mills had been unable to grind on full time on account of low water which leads us to the belief, that as time is an essential element in milling, if the mills could run on full time they would make a great deal more, so that the fault is not in the actual value of the wheat, that being worth just as much to grind in either case. But the system allows the farmer only what the millers can afford to pay while the wheat is actually worth more. If we have the best wheat in the world, (as is frequently stated and as the millers themselves declare) and if the world does not sufficiently appreciate that fact then it is important for all concerned to see that the world finds out that fact as soon as possible and to offer every inducement and to afford every facility for the wheat buyers all over the country to come in and compete for our choice wheat. The railroad company spend annually thousands of dollars in advertising this country to induce men to come and raise this extra wheat and if they can show the wheat dealers that our wheat is really extra and worth competing for and induce them to come and compete for it, they will not only cause every unoccupied acre of land to be cultivated but they will also effectually settle this apparently knotty wheat question. It is no inducement for men to take extra pains, incur extra expense to raise extra wheat unless you follow the extras right through and get them extra prices for their extra wheat. We are glad that we have had the opportunity to meet these gentlemen and have even the limited discussion that we have had for we believe that much good will come of it. It shows us that the railroad company honestly desire to aid the settlers and if they err it is an error of judgment and not from complicity with any ring or monopoly. It has shown that for the volume of wheat raised in this country this year the market facilities of both Minneapolis and Duluth are entirely inadequate to properly handle, and we must have outside buyers in and they must reach us by the cheapest practicable route in order to be able to compete for our wheat. Our time and space is too limited to allow of more than this slight glance at the subject but we can not close without expressing our deep conviction that the results of yesterday's meeting will lead to something of lasting benefits to our Great Northwest.

A PAPER FOR THE TIMES.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS is the pioneer of cheap journalism in the West.

It was founded Dec. 20, 1875, as an evening paper with editions at noon, 3 and 5 o'clock. A complete newspaper,—complete in the one essential feature of American journalism, i. e., presenting all the news,—sold on the street at any price less than the conventional nickel, was an innovation in western journalism, and, like all new enterprises, the "cheap paper" had to contend with long-established custom and even prejudice before securing the recognition it sought and deserved. At the end of the first year, 1876, it had achieved a daily sale ranging from 8,000 to 10,000 copies. From this time forward its progress was beyond all precedent in American journalism. In 1877 its average daily circulation was 22,037 copies; in 1878, 33,314 copies; in 1879, 45,194 copies; in 1880, 54,801 copies. On the morning of March 21, 1881, the CHICAGO MORNING NEWS made its first appearance. In September following, the sixth month of its publication, its circulation amounted to 490,019 copies, or a daily average of 18,846 copies,—a circulation never before attained by any daily paper in the United States, within a corresponding time.

The CHICAGO DAILY NEWS, therefore, as now published, consists of MORNING, NOON, and EVENING ISSUES, known respectively as the MORNING NEWS, NOON NEWS, and EVENING NEWS. The average combined circulation of the three issues of the DAILY NEWS now exceeds 90,000 copies each day. To appreciate the exceptional extent of this vast circulation it is only necessary to state that it is over three times the circulation of any other daily paper in Chicago or the West, while its circulation in the city of Chicago is GREATER than ALL other Chicago daily papers COMBINED. Being an independent paper, the organ of no party, sect, or class, it is the one universally read Chicago paper. The subscription price of the DAILY NEWS, either MORNING or EVENING issue, is $6.00 per year, or $2.00 for four months, postage included.

On July 2, 1878, the DAILY NEWS purchased the CHICAGO EVENING POST, consolidated its daily issue with the DAILY NEWS, and continued its weekly issue under the name of the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS. The WEEKLY NEWS under its present name and management is therefore less than five years old, though as a consecutive weekly publication it is now in its twentieth year. The CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS takes a corresponding field among weekly newspapers to that occupied by the DAILY NEWS among dailies. It gives the news of the world in condensed yet complete form. Its Chicago market quotations are especially complete and trustworthy. That the CHICAGO WEEKLY NEWS has been correct in its judgment of the requirements of a large class of readers of the weekly press is best evidenced by the extent of its circulation, which aggregated in the month immediately preceding the date of this writing, 202,053 copies, or a weekly average of 50,513 copies. The subscription price of the WEEKLY NEWS is but SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS per year, postage included.

The phenomenal success of the CHICAGO NEWS in both its DAILY and WEEKLY ISSUES has been achieved by observing that fundamental principle of offering the best article of its kind in the market at the lowest cost to the purchaser. The CHICAGO NEWS is cheap only in price. The character of its news service is unsurpassed. It is a member of the Western Associated Press, and in addition to the unrivalled news service furnished by this Association, it enjoys the exceptional advantage of its own special telegraphic wire from Chicago to Washington and New York on the East, and to Milwaukee and St. Paul on the North. Giving all the news through reportorial and telegraphic facilities unsurpassed by those of any other Chicago paper, it commends itself to all classes in the community, to rich and poor alike, in that it offers an absolutely complete record of the news of the day in concise form, without the needless verbiage and amplification which render so many metropolitan journals "a weariness to the flesh," while its price brings it within the reach of all classes. It is a paper for the times.

The Bait of the Average Fisherman.

This is the bait the fishermen take, the fishermen take, the fishermen take,
o when they start out the o fish to wake so o early in the o morning. They o take a nip before they go—a o good one, oh! and loud and slow, o for fear the chills will lay them low o so early in the morning. Another when they're on the street, which they repeat each time they meet for "luck"—for that's the way to greet a fisher in the morning. And when they're on the river's brink again they drink without a wink—to fight malaria they think it proper in the morning.
They tip a flask with true delight, they "smile" the more till jolly tight all fishing they are scorning. Another nip as they depart; one at the mart and one to part, but none when in the house they dart, expecting there'll be mourning.
This is the bait the fishermen try who fishes buy at prices high, and tell each one a bigger lie of fishing in the morning.

Farmers and Railroads.

Red Lake Falls Messenger.

The St. Paul Dispatch says that the Duluth & Winnipeg road is to be commenced at once; and similar rumors have been flying around for some time. We are inclined to place some confidence in the statement, as it is a Duluth enterprise and none know better than her merchants the vital importance to Duluth of a direct connection with Northwestern Minnesota and Dakota. But while Duluth men are planning and working, the citizens of other towns, equally interested cannot afford to content themselves with waiting and trusting to others. "The Lord helps those who help themselves," applies to communities as well as to individuals, and when old General Stark advised his men to "trust in Providence—but—keep your powder dry," he was giving advice equally applicable to the more ordinary affairs of life. The wide spread discontent and uneasiness among not only farmers but the business men of the Northwest during the past few weeks, is the natural result of a condition of affairs, which cannot immediately be remedied but that prompt and combined action can provide against for the future.

Whether the claim be well based or not it is certainly generally believed that the railroad companies whose lines run into Minneapolis are in league with the Millers' Association to give them practically the absolute control of the wheat market, and while others besides the agents of the association are free to buy wheat, are so hampered by the railroad companies as to be in fact powerless to handle grain to any advantage for lack of reasonable shipping facilities. The establishing of an independent elevator system, beside requiring an enormous capital, would not give much relief as long as the grain is compelled follow the same route and go to the same market. The erection of flouring mills will furnish a local market, limited however by the possession or lack of facilities for shipment of the product to regular markets, and while the Northwest depends upon a single line of railroad, even this trade will be liable to be hampered by such tariff rates and regulations as the company may establish in aid of the wheat men of Minneapolis.

The question must come home to every man in this wonderfully rich region, "what shall we do to be saved" —from the Shylock policy of the wheat ring, whose greed will be satisfied with nothing less than the pound of flesh. Shall we stand still, with folded hands, and like dumb brutes, suffer without resistance or complaint, or arise, act and emancipate ourselves, and which way shall we direct our efforts?

It must be evident to everyone that a connection with Duluth is of the utmost importance, and that the people of the northwest owe it to themselves to give it all the material aid possible, but difficulty in this connection is that the distance from Duluth to the Red Lake or Red River is almost too great to be covered in one year's building, and that it is important to secure a new outlet by the time another crop is ready for market.

The suggestion of the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, of a road from Grand Forks to Red Lake Falls and thence south to the Northern Pacific road, is the best that can be offered. That portion of the route from Grand Forks to this point would in time become a portion of the through route to Duluth. That to the Northern Pacific, striking either Lake Park, Detroit or Perham, over exceptionally favorable ground for road making, and an exceedingly fertile country, would vary from 60 to 70 miles in length, according to the point reached, a distance easily covered in one season's operations.

We think it certain that the taxpayers of either of these villages, as well as all townships near the line adopted for such a road, would willingly and promptly vote bonds to the extent allowed by law, in aid of such a road, and such action on their part would result in an hundred fold return in benefits resulting from the development of the country. There is no time to be lost on the part of the business men of the Northwest. Prompt, vigorous and united action will if properly directed result in the easy accomplishment of such an undertaking and it simply remains to be seen whether or no, the energy and enterprise of the settler of Northern Minnesota and Dakota are equal to the emergency.

Red Lake Falls Messenger: The business men of Crookston, Grand Forks and Northern Minnesota and Dakota generally are waking up to the necessity of a through route from the Northwestern wheat fields to Duluth, in order to create a competition market. In connection the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL proposes the building of a road from Grand Forks viz: Crookston to Red Lake Falls, thence by a short route to a point on the Northern Pacific, which will give an outlet to Duluth until a through route is completed. There is good sense in this, and we hail it as an indication of an era of good feeling between our sister city and Red Lake Falls as well as a step toward the harmony of action which is absolutely necessary to secure to the farmers of the northwest security from the onslaughts of the Minneapolis ringsters. Will Grand Forks, Fisher, Crookston and Red Lake Falls acting in unison, it will be comparatively easy to secure a road to Duluth, and the latter city may be relied upon to aid materially in the scheme. Set the ball a rolling.

St Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Crookston is now lit up by electricity and is letting her light so shine before her neighboring towns that they may see her good works and kick themselves because they do not inherit the same good fortune.

Capt. W. H. Jennings, of Crookston, was in town a few days last week, organizing a Knights of Honor society. Twenty-one of our citizens subscribed their names and paid the initiation fee as charter members. The captain will be up again next week with the charter and will at once organize the lodge.

Mr. A. C. McKenzie, of Buffalo, N. Y., is in town this week visiting his brother, W. E. McKenzie. Like every one else who comes here from the east he is completly carried away with the glorious Northwest and when he returns home we can rely upon him to speak a good word for us to his eastern friends.

Miss Mary Van Wie, of Crookston spent a few days in town last week visiting Mrs. W. E. McKenzie. Miss Van Wie taught school in this town some six months ago and says that its growth has been so rapid since that time she could hardly recognize the place. She left for Crookston on Saturday and will resume her duties in the school there when the term opens on Monday next.

Poor Lo with his many dogs has been coming into town this week in large numbers and his handsome bronze countenance is lit up with a heavenly smile—made more picturesque by the large quantities of white lead and yellow ocre with which his face has been artistically adorned—and he chuckles to himself as he ropes in the sheckles furnished by his white brethren for snow shoes, moccasins, bead work, skins, and the head and antlers of deer and moose. Among those who had money to invest thus foolishly was our banker, Mr. W. S. Morse, who among other trinkets purchased the head of a moose which the Indians had captured up at Red Lake. The head weighs 150 lbs and the antlers measure six feet across. The moose weighed 1,850 lbs and is said to be the largest one killed in this vicinity in many years. Mr. Morse intends shipping the head to a friend of his in the land department of the Manitoba railway.

Peterson's Magazine for February opens with one of the most charming steel-engravings we have ever seen, called: "Two Little Customers." Besides this, however are several other beautiful embellishments, among them a splendid colored pattern. There is also another engraving—"Homeless and Blind"—illustrating a pathetic little story. The double-sized colored fashion-plate—a specialty of this magazine—is even more beautiful than usual. As for the stories, though always good, they are this month unusually so. Mrs. Ann S. Stephens continues "Her Season In Washington," a novelet that promises to be the best she has ever written. There is also a powerful story called "Jule." Altogether this is a very superior number. We do not see how any lady can get along without "Peterson." The terms are but Two Dollars a year. Great deductions are made for clubs and elegant premiums given for getting up clubs. Now is the time to get up clubs for 1884. Specimens ar sent gratis, if written for, to persons wishing to subscribe or get up clubs. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE CONCLUSIONS OF THE INVESTIGATION.

The "High Joints" have returned to their homes seemingly in high feather and rendered their verdict "no cause of action!". The Pioneer Press says:

"The result of the meeting, Mr. Manvel contended, were that both the railroad and elevator representatives expressed a desire that these meetings would appoint a committee that would be representative of the feelings in those sections to visit St. Paul, and if the committee was able to formulate or put in shape any practicable system, or could suggest the adoption of any rules or regulations that were susceptible of being operated under, the railroad company would be very glad to consider them, and to consider them in a most favorable way in the interest of the wheat-producing class." "Mr. Manvel says this trip was prompted by a desire to get at the actual facts in the case, and he is well satisfied that the whole matter has been greatly exaggerated, and that there is really no foundation for the charges."

In accordance with Mr. Manvel's invitation the farmers' meeting on Saturday last appointed a committee to further confer with the company, but if Mr. Manvel has already decided the case there is no earthly use to look for any measures for relief in that direction. We can readily see how those gentlemen, coming here fully impressed beforehand with the idea that their system is all right, can go back making the statements they do that the farmers when given an opportunity to do so did not present a very strong case, because the time given was too limited to collect all of the evidence needed in so important a case, but we cannot see, in the light of all of the facts, how they can make all of the statements they do. It is said that no farmer had or would give any affidavit to support his case while the facts are that every farmer who had not already given his affidavit was ready and willing to make his statements under oath. The attempt is made to throw the whole blame upon the farmer, while the apparent defects in the wheat buying system are glossed over by sticking closely to a partial statement of the truth. "As for instance, as one gentleman at Crookston said to Mr. Manvel:"

"The chief difficulty in this community, as far as my observation goes, is that we have been living on a basis of twenty-five bushels to the acre, while we only have twenty or less. We are also living on a basis of $1 a bushel, when wheat has only brought from 75 to 80 cents."

That statement, while it has the appearance of truth and candor is as far from being the truth as is the statement that no wrongs exist, and no farmer, or any man acquainted with the true condition of affairs could make the statement as it implies an utter ignorance of the situation or else an attempt to remove the blame from the right party to innocent shoulders. It is a well-known fact throughout this whole valley that a severe drouth visited us last summer which so far from promising a yield of 25 bushels per acre threatened to destroy the crop entirely and almost every farmer calculated that if he made barely his expenses he would do extremely well. This fact, together with the fact that many were very much in debt for necessary machinery and teams caused the most rigid economy to be practiced by the farmers who fully realized the extreme peril of the situation. Now these are facts that are well known and no person, having the interest of the country at heart will dare to deny them. While it may not be so easy, considering the plausible and shrewd statements of Mr. Pillsbury, to point out the radical defects in the present system of wheat-buying, and to suggest the proper remedy, the farmer knows full well that it is a system that works against him in every instance, and it must be so in every case where the buyer makes the grades and prices and the seller has nothing to do but accept those or nothing as he has no opportunity offered to him to appeal to the markets of the world. Human nature is about the same every where and it is not in human nature to pay more for an article than a man is obliged to. The stubborn fact alone remains for us that we can not raise wheat in this country for an average of only about 50 cents per bushel, and the ugly fact remains that there MUST BE SOME SYSTEM devised whereby a farmer can have an equal chance in the markets of the world or else hundreds of farmers will be ruined and that in a very short time. This ruin will operate against the best interests of the country and is sure to follow the present system whether the newspapers continue to agitate the question or whether they do not. The present system forces the farmer to sell his best grain at from 22 to 25 cents less per bushel than he could get if he could reach the eastern markets at reasonable handling charges and it forces him to accept for his so-called frosted wheat all the way from 30 to 40 cents per bushel, prices utterly ruinous and not only that but it forces him, sometimes to sell his good wheat as frosted at these ruinous prices because there is absolutely

NO APPEAL FOR HIM!

The statement was made that the elevator companies, having invested large sums of money in this country must be protected and this protection consists in excluding other buyers and shippers, such as merchants and farmers who desire to ship in carload lots. The elevator men have expended large amounts to build their large houses and after that they expend practically nothing. Thousands of farmers have expended their all in getting farms and improving them and are investing thousands of dollars every year in extending their improvements. Which class deserves protection the most? Which needs it the most? If the country was forced to dispense with the one or the other which class would be missed the most? It is plain that while the country could manage to exist without elevators it cannot without the farmer. The statement was made that this excitement was raised merely to aid a rival railroad company. If that was true the Manitoba railroad would never have been appealed to for aid but the fact is the present railroad agitation is the outgrowth of the wrongs caused by the system of wheat buying. If we should suggest a remedy for the company to adopt it would be that we have tried the present system for a long time and we think it operates against the best interests of the country and we want the privilege of having private wheat houses erected by whoever desires to do so thus giving us a change. We have invested much money in opening our farms and we think our rights to protection should be as sacred as those who have done far less to benefit the country than we have. We are tired of this system whereby we are the losers every time and earnestly desire the adoption of a system that gives greater promise of fairness to the farmers. The railroad company should be as willing to give us this trial as they were to give the millers a trial of their method, to be absolutely fair and impartial and if they will do it and it does not work as we think it would, we will not hold them responsible but will own up beat. We cannot see that the millers system gives us an open market and that is what we want and must have to compete with eastern wheat raisers. Give us an equal chance with all others and we cannot then justly complain if our wheat does not bring all that we think it worth.

The Farmers and The Railroads and Elevators.

Grand Forks Herald.

The officials of the railroad and the ruling spirits of the elevator ring, who must have been fully apprised of the well-advertised farmers' conventions, to be held here on the 24th and 29th, have seen fit to anticipate our rural friends, and come here to hold an informal meeting to-day, at which they will claim they expected the list of grievances of the Red River Valley to be presented to them, on thirty-six hours notice. As it is highly probable that, on such a meagre and short notification of the object of their visit, these gentlemen will be gone before a dozen farmers will know of their presence among us, we take occasion, on behalf of the large number of complainants of this region, to give these officials and elevatorists ample notice of the 24th and 29th, when they may have an opportunity to appear and defend themselves against the charges which have been so freely made all along the line, and reiterated in the columns of nearly every journal which represents the interests of its patrons. Moreover, we invite them to be present if they will, when they will doubtless see and hear something tangible. They harp on the strain that nothing specific, like an affidavit, has been produced to show up their injustice as to grading wheat and discriminating against shippers. Probably, at that meeting, the farmers will present them plenty of statements like the following, which is a complaint in writing, like hundreds that can be obtained;

GRAND FORKS, D. T., Dec. 30, 1883.

I went first to Sterritt's warehouse with a sample of my wheat, and they offered me 35 cents a bushel and said they might possibly give me 40 cents, but no more. This was in November, 1883. I then went to Pillsbury & Hulbert's and they at once offered me 40 cents. I took the same wheat to Brooks Bros. and they gave me 54 cents per bushel without a murmur—a clear gain of 14 cents above the highest offer of either Sterritt or Pillsbury & Co.

S. L. FARNSWORTH."

This illustrates the grading at the elevators, no two of them having the capacity or honesty to grade alike. Any number of affidavits can be secured to show this indefensible inequality in grading, where all is left to the caprice or insolence of the elevator employees. In this lies the burthen of our peoples' complaint, and this the Farmer's convention will prove so thoroughly, that the teeth of the monopolists will rattle, and their sycophantic tools here and elsewhere will want to creep into an airhole on the Red and pray for a sudden freeze over. The next point which will probably be ample illustrated, then and there, is that the railroad company has made this destructive guessing of incompetent if not acquisitive agents, possible, by affording every 30,000 bushel elevator (which means $10,000), a monopoly of transportation. It will require no affidavits, however, for the court papers in the case of Christiani against the Manitoba, in this county, will amply show that he built a small warehouse on their land, with their permission and their promise to ship his grain. For one year they shipped his grain and then under the 30,000 bushel or $10,000 elevator arrangement, unceremoniously choked him off. Hence he brought suit. Well, his case will illustrate all the rest, where would-be shippers could not put up a 30,000 bushel establishment. And this is the second and gravest charge of all, for the business is carried on, in direct violation of law. The railroad company is bound in law, to furnish transportation, and just as much should it obey this law as our courts are in duty bound to protect the railroad's stations from arson and robbery. With the same reason that the company's agents disregard the law of common carriers, our citizens might destroy the property of the company and wipe out the source of its prosperity. Let us have law and fair play. There is nothing fair to the farmers in this meeting of to-day. Come to the Farmers' convention on the 29th and hear the farmers in their own way, then you will know something about what they have suffered from your agents, and what they demand in good reason for the future.

MORTGAGE SALE.

WHEREAS, DEFAULT HAS BEEN made in the conditions of a certain mortgage executed and delivered by Charles A. Curtis and Julia Curtis his wife mortgagors, to Peder Johnson mortgagee, dated the 7th day of May A. D., eighteen hundred and eighty-three and recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds of the County of Polk, in the State of Minnesota, on the 9th day of May A. D 1883, at 8 o'clock a. m., in book "L" of mortgages, on pages 510 and 511 on which there is claimed to be due, at the date of this notice, the amount of three hundred and ninety and 34-100 dollars, and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, notice is hereby given, that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage, and of the statute in such case made and provided, said mortgage will be foreclosed by sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, at public auction at the front door of the court house in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 15th day of February A. D. eighteen hundred and eighty-four at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon, and costs and expenses of sale and the sum of twenty-five dollars attorney's fees, as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure. The premises described in said mortgage, and so to be sold, are the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to wit: Lot number eleven (11) in block number twenty-five (25) in Traills addition to the townsite of East Grand Forks as said lot appears upon the plated map of the said addition to said townsite on record in the office of the Register of Deeds for said Polk County, Minnesota.

PEDER JOHNSON, Mortgagee.
HANS SPELDE, Att'y of Mortgagee.
Grand Forks, D. T.

Dated December 28th, 1883. [35-41]

[First insertion Jan. 10th, 1884.]

Notice of Mortgage Foreclosure Sale.

DEFAULT HAS OCCURRED IN THE CONditions of a certain mortgage made, executed and delivered by Knud Knudsen and Kate D. Knudsen his wife, mortgagors, to Elwood S. Corser, mortgagee, which said mortgage bears date the fourteenth day of April, A. D. 1882, and was recorded on the seventeenth day of April A. D. 1882, in the office of the Register of Deeds of Polk County, in the State of Minnesota, in book "I" of mortgages on page 31. No action has been instituted at law to recover the amount secured by said mortgage.

There is claimed to be due thereon and is actually due on said mortgage at the date of this notice, the sum of five hundred dollars ($500) with interest from the fifteenth day of February, A. D. 1882, at the rate of ten (10) per cent. per annum.

The premises set forth in and conveyed by said mortgage are situated in the County of Polk in the State of Minnesota, and are as follows, to wit: Lot seven (7) in block fourteen (14) in the village of Ozman, according to the recorded plat thereof.

The said mortgage contains a full power of sale in due form of law. In case of default of payment of the said principal or interest in said mortgage specified, or any part thereof, when due. Said mortgage also contains a stipulation on the part of the said mortgagor to pay the sum of ten dollars ($10) as and for attorney's fees for the foreclosure thereof.

Whereas, default has been made in the payment of the principal sum and interest due on said mortgage, and said power of sale has become operative.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by reason of said default and by virtue of the power of sale in said mortgage contained, and pursuant to the statutes in such case made and provided, the said above described mortgaged premises will be sold at public auction at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on Saturday, the first day of March, A. D. 1884, at ten o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount then due on said mortgage, together also with ten dollars ($10) stipulated by said mortgagors to be paid as attorney fees, and including also such costs as are allowed by law.

Dated this seventh day of January, 1884.

'ROUND HOME.

Pretty cold weather for a "mild" winter.

Levi S. Myers was in from the west side on Wednesday.

Mr. N. F. and Eddie Chiniquy arrived on Friday for a short visit.

Mr. Knute Steenerson, of St. Hilaire, was greeting friends in the city this week.

The Merchants bank will soon be made a National bank with a capital of $100,000.

Mr. Beecher, of Beecher & George has gone to New York on a visit of business and pleasure.

Mr. Ed Bivins has returned with his bride and they are visiting friends in the city for a few days.

The hop given by the French band at Fortier's Hall on Monday evening is said to have been a fine affair and well patronized.

Mr. David Huggard was down last Friday morning after a coffin for his mother who died on Wednesday the 9th. Her remains were taken to Ontario for interment.

The St Paul Globe gets out a daisy of a calendar for 1884. It has an owl roosting on every month over an appropriate motto. It is what you might call a'Owly terror!

The young folks give a social hop at Ericsson's Hall on Monday evening next. These entertainments have heretofore proven very pleasant and this one will doubtless be no exception.

A rousing railroad meeting was held at Gentilly on Wednesday. Judge Reynolds, E. C. Davis, E. M. Walsh and others addressed the meeting and a rousing vote showed everybody in favor of building the road.

Peter Cornelius received a letter from Owen Owens, of Liverpool in which Mr. Owens speaks of having met Mr. Fairweather and Mr. Carlisle, of Euclid, both of whom are well and enjoying themselves hugely.

The Firemen's First Annual ball, on Wednesday evening Jan. 23d will be an event long to be remembered and dont you forget it. Dune has got Joe Morgan detailed for special duty where he (Joe) will work in to best advantage.

The directors of the proposed new railroad from Grand Forks to Duluth will hold a private meeting on Monday evening next and on Tuesday a public meeting will be held at Ericsson's Hall to commence at one o'clock. A large attendance is desired.

The Crookston Dramatic Association favored our citizens with "Nevada, or the last mine," on Wednesday evening. Our time and space forbids an extensive mention of the play which was a fine one and excellently well rendered. They will repeat it to-night.

Owing to the fact that the auditor's safe refused to be unlocked on Monday and remained sullen until Wednesday we received the long commissioner's report only in time to commence work upon it this morning, which fact forces us to omit many locals for lack of time to put them in type.

The mission upon which the Hon. B. Sampson has gone to Washington is one fraught with great importance to this country. It has been clearly shown in the events of the past few weeks in this country that the only safety to the farmer lies in his being able to bring his produce into the markets of the world in competition with eastern producers. It is a fact, conceded by all, that our No. 1 Hard wheat produces a flour that is equal in every respect if indeed not superior to winter wheat flour that has always been conceded to be the best in the world. If our wheat can be made into flour right here in the country in which it is grown it can be placed in eastern markets very much cheaper than if it has to go as wheat which will give the purchaser a chance to get nearer its actual value than he can now get or could ever get while shipping his wheat in bulk. Water power is the best motive power for a flouring mill as it is by far the cheapest and will always be. Mr. Sampson goes to advocate a scheme which if successful will render the Red Lake River capable of supplying a water power unrivalled in extent and power in the world. Our experience this fall shows beyond a doubt that our present facilities are wholly inadequate to the demand and that something must be done and that speedily if we would accomplish the results we wish for. Mr. Sampson's plan is to dam the head waters of the Red Lake River at its source, so as to be able to utilize the water as wanted and it is a wise plan that should have the hearty co operation of every man interested in the welfare of the country. There are many water powers along the river some of which are already in operation and some to be improved, Crookston to St. Hilaire and beyond and the experiment of the past fall demonstrates the great necessity of some means being taken to regulate the supply of water which can be done through the dam spoken of. Our representatives in Congress will do well to heed the request for this improvement as it is one of the things most urgently needed here.

Mr. Ensebritson, of Stephen, was in the city seeing the sights this week.

Albert Kindlar and Chas Bond have started for New Mexico in quest of a fortune.

Judge F. Ives passed through the city this week, enroute for Chicago. Mrs. Ives will return with him.

The Red Lake Falls Gazette reports the death of the son of Dr. L. Lemieux, of Red Lake Falls, aged 9 years.

Mr. and Mrs. F. Bivens returned from Wabasha last Friday. Ed. and his bride will be here shortly, will spend a few days visiting their friends and will then go home to Stephen, Marshall Co. Minn.

Mr. C. M. Shultz, special correspondent of the Pioneer Press was in the city this week investigating the farmers' grievances and expressed great indignation at the way in which our wheat has been manipulated. He says that it needs only for a man to travel through this Northwest as he has to be convinced that the system now in vogue is entirely wrong and must be changed.

It is said that on Wednesday night, after the meeting of the high joints, in city hall, Mr. F. Sterritt told Mr. Manvel that he guessed that he (Sterritt,) would stop at a hotel that night as he "was obliged to take the early train next morning for St. Paul on important business." To which Mr. Manvel replied "No you don't, Mr. Sterritt, but you will go right along with this company and face the music with the rest of us!" Mr. Sterritt went along with the high joints.

Articles of incorporation for the Grand Forks, Crookston and Lake Superior R. R. were filed with the Secretary of State last week. The incorporators are E. M. Walsh, J. R. Clements Wm. Box, Paul C. Sletten, and Louis Berthiaume, of Crookston, and Geo. H Walsh, W. T. Collins, W. H. Brown, J. S. Eshelman and John Lerfess, Jr., of Grand Forks. This road is the result of the present wheat agitation which has shown the necessity for some other outlet than we now have if wheat raising is to be a profitable occupation.

The farmers' meeting on Saturday last was well attended and much interest manifested. The railroad committee made a verbal report, stating in substance that no definite result had been obtained as Mr. Manvel had not finished his tour enabling him to make up his mind in the matter and that he wanted another committee appointed to confer with him after he had had a chance to fully investigate the matter, said committee to formulate a plan for releif to submit to the company. On motion M. R. Brown was elected chairman of the committee with power to appoint the remainder of the committee. He appointed Mr. E. D. Childs, Mr. W. G. Lytle, Mr. A. N. Hixon and Hon. H. Steenerson. Mr. Steenerson introduced a resolution which after a prolonged discussion was tabled. After a lengthy discussion the meeting adjourned to meet at the same place on Saturday Jan. 26th, 1884, at 2 o'clock p. m.

A Card.

Whereas at the recent village election the citizens saw fit to elect Mr. J. M. Near, over W. E. McKenzie that gentleman has attempted to get even by making the false report that the council have imposed a license of $25 on our butchers which is doubtless done for the purpose of damaging the reputation of our council to the extent of the influence of the Spectator. If this be the case the council have nothing to fear.

KNUTE STEENERSON, Councilman.

So far, Crookston has fortunately escaped the ravages of that dreaded monster the Fire Fiend, but we know not at what hour he may appear in our midst. GONE BUT NOT LOST.

The Romantic Love Story of a Hallelujah Lass, in Which the Salvation Army Played a Part.

At 7 o'clock Wednesday evening last a quiet wedding was celebrated in the parlor of Reid's hotel. The interested parties were Robert McCullough, of Cecil county, Maryland, and Annie E. Price of Hancock, Washington county. Rev. Dr. J. S. B. Hodges performed the ceremony and early yesterday morning the newly-married pair left for their new home in Cecil county. There is a little history connected with the courtship and marriage of the couple which will prove interesting. The bride and groom where acquainted in childhood's happy hours, and their friendship at that early stage was fast and strong. They separated years ago, and each went their way. The groom occupied himself with farming, and spent his days in tilling the land, paying an occasional visit to this city. About one year ago he chanced to run across the friend of his childhood in Baltimore, and the early friendship was renewed. Instead of meeting a young girl, he beheld a matured woman of some thirty summers. She also met a middle-aged man in place of the youth. The bride at the time followed the occupation of a book agent, and her face was well-known throughout the business portion of the city. Many remember the plump figure, light auburn hair, and spectacled face of the book agent, as she went from place to place and in a modest manner offered her periodicals for sale. How, when refused, she would glance timidly at him who refused her and tremblingly ask him to reconsider his answer; and who forgets the smile of satisfaction and of joy which overspreads her countenance when that appeal was successful. But then she lived a distasteful life, and ofttimes in the solitude of her chamber she would rebel at the fate which had cast her life in such hard lines. While thus situated alike in business and mind, she encountered her former friend—the farmer. McCullough was greatly pleased to see her again, and from her lips learned the story of her trials and tribulations. He listened to the pathetic recital with a saddening heart as she related the many snubs and rebuffs she had received. Upon the completion of the narrative he vowed to cherish and protect her, and give her his heart and home. He was a religious man, however and she had cared but little for religion. She gave as excuse the want of time and other reasons, which he respected, but consoled her by remarking there was yet time to turn her thoughts to religion. Under the circumstances she thought it would be wrong to accept the offer of such a good man, and, with her heart nearly breaking, she told him how it would be better for both for her to refuse. It was an eventful moment in the lives of both. If Robert had accepted the refusal as final the marriage the other night might never have taken place, but he was equal to the emergency. In glowing terms he pictured to her the comforts of a religious life, and as an earnest of what he said he induced her to accompany him one evening to the barracks of the Salvation army, on Fayette street. Upon arriving she experienced a new and undefinable feeling possessing her. She was much impressed with the exercises, and took everything that was said as referring especially to herself. She came again and again, and greater and greater became her desire to be received into the fold and girding on the armor to go forth and save souls. As the desire grew she became an enthusiast, and her faithful friend was delighted at the great change. She communicated to him her determination to join the gallant army, and on last Christmas eve he led her to the altar and she was received into the fold. Here was the perfect woman in the eyes of Robert, and he felt heart glad at the good results. Becoming a full-fledged hallelujah lass, she wore the armor of the holy band, and when her compatriots went forth to sew the seed of the religion she accompanied them, and her voice equalled the rest in prayers and hymns. Gone was her book selling, and her time was devoted to exhorting and shouting. Many who had missed her from her accustomed routes while a book agent were astonished to meet her praying and singing in the streets, exposed to the ridicule of the ungodly. Yet she bore all, and her reward came. McCullough visited her again and implored her to accept the offer he had made her a year before. She chastened in spirit, felt her proud soul humbled, she consented and the wedding came on as stated. A visit was paid the barracks of the Salvation army last evening, and in conversation with "Charley," one of the band he said the departure of "Singing Annie" had left a blank it would be hard to fill. He added, however, that Annie was still a member of the army, and would remain such, spreading the truth in the spot wherein she would dwell.—Baltimore American.

Funny Chimpanzies.

The keeper of the chimpanzees at the Zoological Garden placed a doll-baby in their cage the other day. The doll was placed on the floor of the cage leaning against the wall. It was clothed in a red dress that attracted the attention of the chimpanzees in a moment. At first they stood at a respectful distance and "hoo-hooed" at it to show that they had not fallen in love with it at first sight. Then they began to stamp on the floor to scare it away.

Finding this unavailing, the big one dashed up to within a foot or two of the passive baby, stamping and chattering but, finding that the strange thing did not budge, she incontinently turned tail and fled. The little one was not to be outdone, although she was evidently greatly in fear of it. So she took her blanket and held it up before her while she approached, but she did not go far. After a little the big one got up courage enough to get quite near, so that, picking up a long straw, she could tickle the newcomer under her chin. The doll never stirred. The end of the straw was examined and smelt of by the two animals, and, nothing specially harmful being found, they ventured to touch it. This was too great a test of courage, and both scampered to the top of their cage. They could not be induced to go back for some time, but, after awhile, curiosity got the better of fear, and they returned to the inspection, which was mostly confined to sitting in front of it and making faces at it.

Tom Manley, the keeper, tied the figure to a swinging rope. The big one dragged it by the hem of its garment to the box in which they sleep. They placed it inside, and at once executed a war-dance on the top. The little one stopped her noisy sister with a cuff and drew out the unfortunate. Then, sitting on the floor, she held it in her arms as if it had been a real baby of her own. After making evident fun of this soft-heartedness, the other pulled the doll away and deliberately sat upon its head. While she was endeavoring to regain the plaything the dress did not long remain intact. After this they hauled the body about the cage, up the tree and on to the cross-beam, and then throw it to the ground. One piece of the dress they [illegible] turned into a head-dress, [illegible] of them adorned herself with the mirror in the corner of the cage.—Philadelphia Press.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Hints for Farmers.

The vice of cribbing has the effect of keeping a horse in poor condition. It is easily prevented, and in time cured, by putting the feed-box near the floor, with no part more than 18 inches above it. A horse cannot crib with the head so low as that.

If I want clover to make hay or to pasture, I sow seed of the medium variety; but when the principal object is to improve the soil, I sow sapling clover and let the crop rot on the land after cattle have grazed what they will take.—Elmira Advertiser.

We take two significant facts from the records of the Connecticut institution for the state insane. During the seventeen years of its existence less than one-forth of the inmates were from outdoor vocations, and Superintendent Shew says: "It is gratifying to note the beneficial change in the conduct of some patients soon after awakening their interest in garden work."

Farmers' poultry are too closely, inbred, which makes them weakly and impotent, and they are careless about the old hens. Young hens will lay three or four times as many eggs, and the male birds should be changed at least every other year, introducing new blood. In no case should a male be allowed to breed with his own offspring. Very few farmers consider these things, and hence poor returns.

Colonel Curtis gives the following warning to dairymen: "A fatal error has run through all the breeding of the past, among dairymen, and is still very generally continued. It is a lack of proper selection of males to breed from. If a dairyman has an extra good cow, he is pretty sure to save her heifer calves, which very seldom turn out to be as the dam. The cow herself may be an accident, and greatly lack the power to impress her good qualities on her offspring. Added to this is the fact that one-half of the blood in the offspring may be that of a villainous scrub male, and is almost always that of an inferior or very indifferent bull. The cow alone is depended on to give value to the calf."

Bits of Home Gossip.

In the newest houses dining-room chairs show a new departure in the fact that they are covered with heavy antique tapestries instead of leather, while library furniture is frequently covered in jute velours.

Very pretty receptacles for whisk brooms are made in blue and pink satin, embroidered in colors and mounted on inlaid ebony frames. In some a bevelled mirror is inserted above the arched piece which receives the broom.

A novelty in sideboards is of light make in walnut, and has two small cupboards beneath and a series of small shelves rising above, terminating in a picturesque railing.

A good deal of attention is paid now to lamp shades and their covers. Not only are shades themselves of every conceivable color and design—one we have seen having the globe itself represented upon it, every country distinctly marked, with the degrees of latitude and longitude—but many are decorated with a hanging of lace, and others have covers most elaborately constructed of tissue paper or silk and lace, with embroideries and ribbon flowers.

One of the handsome hall chairs we have seen is in crimson alligator-skin, the framework being in oak studded with brass nails. Others in black morocco have heavy brass ornaments as a finish for the arms; still another is in a framework of rosewood, inlaid with brass.

A recent novelty in a mahogany sideboard is the insertion of panels on either side of the back of illuminated leather. The effect is somewhat strange but decidedly decorative.

Beautifully finished liquor cases are covered with dark plush, and contain in the box itself a bottle in Bohemian glass and in the lid the six little glasses; others, in triangular shape, contain three liquor bottles and nine glasses.

The latest style for plaques is a clock as the centre and a framework of hammered brass.

No Grain for a Month Before Calving.

A late Rural says in "Querist," "Give no grain food whatever to a cow for four weeks before calving." Would bran and shorts be injurious to a heifer giving four quarts a day now—about a month before calving? She is a fine half Jersey three-year-old. Her mother, ten-year-old, made 2 1-2 pounds of butter a day, and my heifer is likely to surpass her.

Ans.—A cow of this kind should be dried off at least a month before calving and one way to do this is to stop giving any kind of grain food. Nearly every case of garget or inflammation in newly calved cows may be traced to over-feeding before they come in. Therefore as means of safety we repeat, give no grain food whatever to a cow for a month before she comes in; and especially to a large or rich milker. The writer has practiced this for many years, and has never lost a calf or had a case of garget or any other trouble with a calving cow, and attributes the exception to the previous care exercised. "It is always better to be safe than sorry."—Rural New Yorker.

Feed for Hogs and Calves.

A. D. F. Mazeppa, Minn.—1. Does it pay to cook food for hogs? 2. Should corn-meal be fed dry or moistened? 3. Are not ground corn and oats better than unground for calves?

Ans.—1. There is a difference of opinion in regard to cooking feed for hogs; but practically we don't believe it will pay for the fuel and labor. But few feeders cook the food and that is a strong argument against the practice.

2. When corn meal is fed to pigs it is best to moisten it and feed it in the form of a thick slop, and if it fermented a little until it is slightly sour it is all the better. 3. Calves should certainly have ground feed and not whole grain, but it should be fed moderately so that it is completely digested.—Rural New Yorker.

Forestry.

Dr. A. G. Humphrey, in a lecture before the Illinois Horticultural society on the important subject of forestry, made some statements and suggestions of general interest and value:

"I knew a tract of ten acres planted, in Iowa, to walnut, oak, hickory and butternut, which yielded the fourteenth year after planting $150 worth of seed. The present demand will make many kinds of forest trees valuable for their seed alone for years to come. While it would be most desirable to have all districts not adapted to agricultural products planted to timber, it would doubtless increase the productive capacity of agricultural districts if every large farm was protected on the northwest and north-east by a belt of timber. Very few varieties of timber trees can thrive if shelly pastured or even grazed upon. If you go into any second growth forest, where cattle or hogs have been long kept you will find many young trees dead or dying.

Plenty of Green Fodder.

The largest quantity of green fodder that can be produced upon an acre of ground is from a crop of Fall rye cut in June, and followed immediately by corn on the same ground. If 4 bushels of rye are sown to the acre at least 8 tons of fodder may be cut, and if it is cured green and cut when in full blossom it will make very good hay. If the corn is planted in rows 3 feet apart and 3 seeds to every foot of the row, at least 15 to 20 tons per acre may be grown, yielding 5 tons of dry fodder. Oats and peas sown early will yield 8 tons per acre of green fodder, and Hungarian grass, which may be sown when this crop comes off, will yield about as much. But the soil must be good. A dressing of 50 bushels of wood ashes per acre would help very much in growing such fodder crops as these. The fodder will go further if ensilaged, no doubt, but this is a matter of some expense in making a silo, which is to be considered.

To Avoid Sunday Work.

Mary Jane is a young lady of convictions. One of her latest is, that quite too much work is done on Sunday, wherefore a decided change has come about in our bill-of-fare for that one day in seven. At first the family of nine were somewhat amazed to sit down to breakfast with nothing warm except coffee, but the exquisite table appointments, the bountiful provision and the dignity, suavity, and grace with which Mary Jane presided, made grumbling out of the question. After breakfast a little talk and study on the Sunday-school lesson, and then many hands made light of the little work, for Mary Jane said everybody ought to help on Sunday morning, and when the dishes were washed (no tin or iron ones), the the chamber work and a bit of brushing up done, all were ready for church and found the luxury of a little time left to breathe in their best clothes and meditate on their blessings before the carry-all drove to the door. The afternoon dinner—cold—with hot tea from the sitting-room stove, was quickly laid on, and there were only the dishes to wash afterward. Really, Sunday began to seem like a day of rest. The plan is working still, with only some good-natured raillery about the new departure and the cook's cold-heartedness. It requires a little more work on Friday and Saturday, but it pays in Sunday freedom. And there is no difficulty in furnishing a table. Here are some of Mary Jane's items: For breakfast, cold meat and potatoes, catsup, or some other relish, both Graham and white bread, apple-sauce, graham mush or oatmeal, molded in cups and eaten with cream and sugar; or apple-pudding, or rice-pudding and crullers, ginger snaps or cookies.

For dinner, cold meat, baked beans and pork, the two kinds of bread, one or two kinds of cake, pie, some good sauce, or sweet baked apples with cream and sugar, or a nice pudding. Last Sunday, as we folded our napkins in the morning, Rebecca said: "Mary Jane, I never ate a better breakfast than this," and Dick endorsed it by saying: "Them 'ere's my sentiments, tew!"—Rural New Yorker.

Methods of Seeding With Tame Grasses.

The experiments in seeding tame grasses on the Nebraska Industrial college farm as we gather from the report, gave the following results, timothy, red clover orchard grass, and Kentucky blue grass being used: When sown very early in the spring, on fall-sown rye, where the rye was pastured and kept rather short, the plan was moderately successful. The rye must not be allowed to grow too high, so as to shade the growing grass too much; nor must it be pastured so close as to allow the ground to get heated by the direct rays of the sun. The tramping of the animals pasturing on rye was, the report says, evidently an advantage to the grass, which grew best where well tramped. One patch of rye which was allowed to mature, seemed to to have choked out the grass entirely, or what little lived through was burned up by the hot sun of mid summer after the shelter of the rye had been removed.

Another plan tried was the following: Somewhat late in the spring, after May 1, the land was ploughed and sown to winter rye, and well harrowed to compact the soil and give a smooth surface. On this timothy, clover and blue grass were sown and lightly brushed in. Five acres treated in this way in the spring of 1882 gave an excellent stand, and grew well through the season. The rye grew slowly, and spread over the ground so as to shade it somewhat without drawing much on the moisture. This patch had been used for a hog lot, and the soil was not in good condition, but it was desirable to get it into grass as soon as possible, and the experiment was tried.

The most satisfactory plan tried, however, was to sow the grass seed quite early in the season without any other crop. To secure the best results on this plan says the report, the soil should be ploughed the preceding fall and well dragged down so as to be in shape to retain its moisture. In a fall when the soil is too dry to plough up finely and pack well, it would be better to leave the ploughing till spring. Where as will usually happen on old ground, weeds come up thickly, they must be mown down several times during the season. A piece sown in the spring of 1882 in this way grew well and bloomed freely in July. On June 29, one square foot of this grass was cut close to the ground, and the weight of the green grass was just eight ounces. At this rate the green grass on an acre would have weighed over ten tons, and dried would have produced over two tons of hay. It is true that the early part of 1882 was very favorable for the growth of grass, but an equally luxurious growth has been seen in other years.

They also had fair success in sowing timothy, blue grass, and clover seed on prairie pastures where the grass was partly destroyed. The chief difficulty appeared to be that the stock kept the tame grass nipped off so close that it had but a poor chance to grow, and consequently was a long time in becoming established.

The report on this subject concludes: The value of tame grass for pasture in this state may be considered established. Tame grasses will yield more food to the acre, excepting only during the dry months: they give a full month more of grazing in the spring before prairie grasses are up, and so much latter in the fall. Clover and timothy will retain their hold longer here than in the Eastern States. In the driest part of dry seasons they became quite brown, yet with fall rains, or even the absence of excessive drought, they become green again. There is but one drawback to their extensive growth for hay; that is the circumstances that it is frequently rainy about the time that the tame grass hay is to be made.—Western Rural.

Wide Spread Popularity of "Home Sweet Home."

The explanation of the wide popularity (if we may use the word so debased) of the one song of John Howard Payne is to be sought for in its universal applicability to the human race. Only among bestial degraded races of mankind do we find no trace of attachment to home. It is difficult to say whether the home feeling is divine or merely human, or even purely animal, since we share that sentiment (if it be a sentiment) with the creatures whose dumb inarticulate cries are often their only lamentation over homes of which they are bereft. But the noblest part of the human race thinks chiefly of its home, its abiding-place, its haven of rest, in which is hidden all the sweet domesticity of motherhood, childhood, and married life. Separated from these the soul of man is uneasy, unfixed uncheerful. In our nomadic life, full of changes and vicissitudes, these separations are inevitable and frequent. The passionate longing, the pensive sorrow expressed in Payne's lyric, have been common to the human race. In these simple words the poet gave expression to the universal thought of homesickness that at some time or another has darkened every heart. It was not necessary to his fame that he should have composed any other literary work.—N. Y. Times.

Aimed at the Brakeman.

No, my son, that gentlemen in the azure clothing and gilt buttons is not a naval officer. He is a gentleman of leisure, of no profession, and without and above occupation. He spends his time on the cars, because he can there best serve his fellows. He is always doing some good act. At one moment he is locking the stove door, to prevent the fire from going out; at another he is turning down the lights, to prevent the passengers from reading, and thereby injuring their eyesight, and at the same time furnishing to all the rich perfume which the partial consumption of kerosene oil always affords; and anon he is playfully mystifying his fellow-mortals by calling out the names of stations in language untelligible and unknown. But his principal and pleasantest labor is to assist young ladies off the cars. It is estimated by statisticians that the average brakeman squeezes the arms of 4,798,345 young ladies per annum. It is very pleasant to be a brakeman, but only the sons of millionaires can afford to aspire to the position.—Boston Transcript.

Biliousness.

Bilious symptoms invariably arise from indigestion, such as furred tongue, vomiting of bile, giddiness, sick headache, irregular bowels. The liver secretes the bile and acts like a filter or seive, to cleanse impurities of the blood. By irregularity in its action or suspensions of its functions, the bile is liable to overflow into the blood, causing jaundice, sallow complexion, yellow eyes, bilious diarrhœa, a languid, weary feeling and many other distressing symptoms. Biliousness may be properly termed an affection of the liver, and can be thoroughly cured by the grand regulator of the liver and biliary organs, Burdock Blood Bitters. It acts upon the stomach, bowels and liver, making healthy bile and pure blood, and opens the culverts and sluiceways for the outlet of disease. Sold everywhere and guaranteed to cure.

Costly Billiard Room.

Probably the most costly billiard-room in the world is in the Waddingham mansion, at West Haven, Conn. Its dimensions are 35x26 feet and it is finished in solid oak and mahogany, carved in the most artistic manner, the frescoing on a ceiling alone costing upward of $10,000, and the chandeliers, $2,500. The tables are to be made of solid oak and mahogany, and entirely covered with the most elaborate carvings. The beds are to be of one solid piece of slate for each table. The cushion rails will be fastened on by a new device which effectually does away with boring and running cushion holes through the rails, thereby destroying the effect of the carving. The cost of the two tables when completed will be $5,000.

DRY TETTER.
For years I was afflicted with Dry Tetter of the most obstinate type. Was treated by many of the best physicians; took quantities of mercury, potash and arsenic, which, instead of curing the Tetter, crippled me up with mineral poison and rheumatism. The Tetter continued to grow worse, and the itching almost made me crazy. In this condition I was induced to take Swift's Specific, and the result was as astonishing as it was gratifying. In a few months the Tetter was entirely well, the Mercurial Poisoning all out of my system, and I was a well man—and due only to Swift's Specific. All like sufferers should take it.

"I was troubled for many years with serious Kidney and Liver Complaint, Gravel, etc.; my blood became thin; I was dull and inactive; could hardly crawl about, and was an old worn out man all over, and could get nothing to help me, until I got Hop Bitters, and now I am a boy again. My blood is pure, kidneys are all right, and I am as active as a man of 30, although I am 72.—Father

"For ten years my wife was confined to her bed with such a complication of ailments that no doctor could tell what was the matter or cure her, and I used up a small fortune in humbug stuff. Six months ago I saw a U. S. flag with Hop Bitters on it, and I thought I would be a fool once more, and I tried it, but my folly proved to be wisdom, and two bottles cured her, she is now as well and strong as any man's wife, and it cost me only two dollars.

FORT AND FLEET.

Abandonment of Norfolk Navy Yard—A Broken Pledge and a Cowardly Act—The Finest Navy Yard in the World Given to the Flames.

Detroit Free Press.

There were dozen of reasons why the Federal Government should have held on to Norfolk navyard, and not one single solid reason why it should have been abandoned as it was. On the 19th of April, 1861, that yard was one of the finest in the world. On the morning of the 20th it was a scene of such desolation as men look upon but once in a lifetime. The Government had spent millions of dollars in machinery and buildings and appliances, and the yard was full of cannon, anchors, cables, shot and other material almost worth their weight in gold just on the outbreak of a war.

Virginia had seceded, and many government posts in the south had been taken possession of in the name of the confederacy. Every citizen north and south knew that war was coming like a billow of flame, but the volcano had not fairly burst forth. There were only a few marines at the yard, but, 1,000 volunteers could have been thrown into the place by a snap of the president's finger. New York, Boston, or Philadelphia could have raised 500 or 1,000 men to hold the yard within ten hours after having been appealed to, and there was no moment previous to the evening of the 19th when a band of volunteers could not have been landed.

In spite of the protests of army and army officers it was decided to abandon Norfolk. Had it been decided to send a small reinforcement the place could have been held until everything of value had been removed. It was down on the confederate programme that Norfolk would be vigorously defended, and its easy possession was a matter of intense surprise.

On the 19th of April the Confederate Gen. Taliaferro, then in command of the few thousand militia Virginia had rushed into the field, reached Norfolk and boldly entered the navy yard to see what Uncle Sam was going to do about it. Commodore McCauley, then commandant held a "talk" on the subject and it was agreed that neither party should take an effective step until receiving further instructions from their superiors. It was a confab of two hypocrites. McCauley had already received instructions to abandon the place, burning and destroying what he could not take away. The confederate general had his instructions to capture the yard, and troops were already on the march to attack it.

As soon as Taliaferro left the gates were locked, extra sentinels posted to prevent citizens from discovering what was going on, and then every man in the yard set to work to carry out the plan already matured. The Pawnee and Cumberland were the only two vessels which could be made use of, and all articles of a portable nature were carried abroad as fast as possible. In this way most of the small arms, many small cannon, all the books and records and models and various other things were saved. But the chief loss to the Federals would result from what could not be moved in a few brief hours.

There were four or five fine vessels in various stages of completion, and two afloat. Just then those ships were worth millions in the North—tens of millions to the South—but neither were to profit by them.

McCauley intended to destroy everything and then slip out like a fugitive from justice. Had Dupont, Dahlgren or Porter been in command there would have been a fight, and when forced to evacuate, the Federal forces would have played the guns of the Pawnee upon everything in reach. Instructions from Washington at that time were suggestions, guesses and suppositions, and McCauley could have taken the same course as Maj. Anderson did.

But there was to be no fighting. The man who had a chance to become a hero preferred to be a deceiver. Within half an hour after he had agreed to hold things in statu quo until further orders, the two ships afloat were being scuttled and property was being hurried aboard the Pawnee. The capstans, windlasses, and other fixtures on the vessels were rendered useless, standing-rigging destroyed, and so many holes were bored through the bottoms that it was hoped they could never be raised after going to the bottom.

There was the grand old Pennsylvania, carrying guns to have replied to every piece of ordnance thus far mounted by the confederates, the Columbus, the Merrimac, the Raritan, the Delaware and the Dolphin, together with two or three half-finished cutters and frigates yet unmanned, and four or five vessels to be repaired. No plan was proposed or discussed to save one of these all though the Pawnee could have towed them out one by one in spite of any hindrance from the confederates.

The ships which could not be scuttled were to be burned. Cabins, forepeaks and holds were filled with wood and coal, and the hulks on the stocks were smeared with turpentine and oil and piled around with cordwood. With each hulk would go to the ship-house, and with the ship-house all the sails cordage and such stuff as had been stored up or could be dragged there.

When the destruction of the ships had been insured attention was turned to the various buildings in the yard. Most of these were of brick and of the most substantial sort, and only a part of the furniture could be removed. The machinery in the bakeries was broken up, desks and chairs knocked to pieces for kindling-wood, and two or three small engines destroyed. Then bonfires were prepared in the various houses, and for fear that the flames might not complete the destruction intended, kegs of powder were placed here and there, as was afterwards done at Pensacola by the confederates.

Although the commandant had only about twenty hours in which to begin and finish his work it was time enough to work appalling destruction. At dark it was known throughout Norfolk and Portsmouth that the two ships had been scuttled and that something unusual was transpiring in the navy yard, but the Confederates were not yet ready for a movement. It was not anticipated that the place would be abandoned, and no one dreamed that possession could be had without resistance and bloodshed.

The afternoon wore away and evening came, and still every man in the yard was hard at work. It was intended to drive a rat-tail file into the vent of every cannon, and thus render them at least temporarily useless to the Confederates, but in the haste of doing so much this enterprise was not carried out, nor, was the fixed ammunition thrown into the water, as contemplated.

The shipways, basins and dry-docks were damaged as much as possible, the spars and timbers prepared for burning, and by 10 o'clock there was little more to do before applying the torch and sailing away.

The magazine was captured before 10 o'clock in the evening, or two hours before the Pawnee steamed away. At any moment during this interval she could have driven the confederates away, but she did not make a move, much to their astonishment. But for that power Beauregard would have had to fall back from Bull Run, perhaps to Richmond, without a battle. Such a movement might have changed the complexion of the entire campaign, and the first battle fought might have resulted in a crushing confederate defeat.

An hour before midnight the loading of the Pawnee and Cumberland had been finished, and the marines and employes filed aboard. Citizens of Norfolk and Portsmouth had heard of the capture of the powder, and were assembling in excited crowds, but none could secure information as to what action McCauley threatened to take. He being an old officer, it was generally believed that he would fight, and the assertion that he would abandon the post without firing a musket would have been resented even by his enemies. The guards were kept at their stations until a quarter of twelve and then withdrawn very quietly and detailed to light the various fires.

Ten minutes was time enough to apply the torch to anything prepared, and before the first blaze had thrown its light over the yard every soul was aboard the vessels. In ten minutes more, after seeing that the destruction would be complete, the Pawnee steamed away for fortress Monroe, the Cumberland following in tow. It was not until the midnight heavens were alight with the angry flames that the confederates realized what had taken place and was then occurring. Then a grand rush was made for the navy yard.

The Federal commander had made sure work with his incendiary torches. The Confederates rushed in to find hulks and storehouses and offices in flames beyond any hopes of salvation. Men rushed here and there seeking to save what could be dragged out, but as the mines which had been prepared began to explode the excited populace were forced to fall back and become spectators of a scene full of grandeur and desolation. Everything was dry as tinder, and the flames took hold fiercely and towered aloft until the white caps rolling into the bay changed color to blood-red, and the sentinels at Fortress Monroe stood aghast to see midnight turned into day by the awful reflection.

All the remainder of the night and far into next day the flames continued their work of destruction, but what was saved to the confederates was of inestimable value just then. It was a work of little magnitude to raise the Merrimac, which afterwards became the celebrated ironclad ram, and within sixty days many of the cannons were thundering defiance at Union forces hundreds of miles away.

The north was indignant over the way Norfolk had been given up, and it was a matter of regret with the government. There was a slur, too, in the commandant agreeing to a truce and then going to work to burn and destroy. Had McCauley defied the confederates he could have held them at bay for three or four days at least, and had the government backed his spirit with reinforcements who can say that Bull Run would have been a Union defeat, the Merrimac ever rebuilt, or Norfolk become a confederate stronghold.

The great powder magazine, containing tons of various grades of powder, was in charge of a single sentinel—a petty officer named Oliver, who has been in the United States service as man and boy for upwards of twenty year. On that eventful day he was still a Union man, and was ready to obey every order from his superior. He had been given no special instructions, nor did he know at dark that the place was to be abandoned.

In the evening, as Oliver sat at the supper table surrounded by his children—his wife being dead—there suddenly came the tramp of many feet and he found himself a prisoner to a band of thirty or forty of the Norfolk Fire Department. It was a band that had volunteered for this very duty, and their appearance was a complete surprise.

Oliver surrendered only after he had been overpowered and bound, and his captors could neither coax nor threaten him into giving up the key of the magazine. Axes were brought and the doors cut away, and, as was stated in a former article, this powder went to Richmond and was served out to fight the battle of Bull Run.

EDWIN BOOTH.

His Reception in Bremen.

London Era, March 10.

A very gratifying incident occured at the finish of Mr. Booth's engagement in Bremen. The play was "Hamlet." At the end, after Mr. B. had acknowledged his fourth call, as he was leaving the stage, he was met at the wings by the entire company and chorus of the theatre, who commenced to sing in his honor a beautiful "Farewell." It was exquisitely sung, and was a great surprise to Mr. Booth, who, as the company advanced, retreated to the middle of the stage, where he was motioned to be seated. As the song finished the prompter's bell rang and the curtain rose again. The audience, hearing the singing, had not left their seats. A young lady of the company then came to the stage bearing a velvet cushion, upon which reposed a silver wreath, upon each leaf of which was inscribed the names of those who had played with him, including that of the director. The "King" then made a very complimentary and flattering speech in English, and Mr. B. responded with his "usual" few words. Then Horatio called for three cheers for Mr. B., in which the audience heartily joined. The floral wreaths and bouquets so filled the carriage that there was scarcely room for the actor and his business-manager to ride home to the hotel. In the morning the chorus of the theater serenaded him at the hotel, and the station, was thronged to see him depart. Mr. Booth's success follows him everywhere, and the directors in each city solicit a re-engagement; but he will not listen to them, as he needs rest, and has decided to finish early next week in Vienna. He will then spend a few weeks in recreation in Italy, and take London for a month's holiday on his way home to New York, which he intends reaching the end of June. Mr. Booth appears at Leipsic on the 18th, 19th, and 20th, and opens at Vienna on the 30th at the Stradt theatre.

America's Tallest Man.

White Oak Letter in the Orleans Democrat.

Being at the house of Mr. Franklin, in Titus county, mention was made of the Texas giant, and I learned that he was a neighbor of my host. Mr. F. kindly consented to accompany me to his house. After entering I observed windows as well as doors were as low or lower than usual, but the loft was quite high, being laid cross-wise with the floor, the ends of the planks resting upon the side plates of the room and two joists, which rested on the end plates, the house having the gables weather-boarded. The giant sat smoking his pipe. While I ruminated on the mode of approaching him I took notice that he did not appear very tall as he sat, yet my friend, who sat next to him, a man of usual height, seemed only as a half-grown boy. Pencil in hand, I said to him: "Mr. Franklin said you would be willing to give him items of interest in regard to yourself in which the public will take an interest?"

"Oh, certainly; I was born in South Carolina, Greenville district, May 5, 1830. My father removed to Missouri, Morgan county, in 1833. In 1850 I went to California by the overland route. I returned from California by water—from changes to New Orleans on the Falcon. From New Orleans I returned to Missouri and was busy farming mostly till the war broke out. March 8, 1853, I married Miss Mary T. Thurston, my first cousin. She has borne me four children, all boys. Only one is living. One lived to be over 21. He was 6 feet 7 inches high. My father was only 6 feet 2 inches. Mother was a little over average height. My father was twice married. His 15 children were 10 boys and 5 girls. The boys were all over 6 feet. I had one cousin who was 6 feet 6 inches."

"What number is your boot?" I inquired.

"It is a 15; my foot is 13 inches long and I wear a No. 15."

"What size is your hat?"

"It is 7 1-8."

"What is your height?"

"I have been measured," he replied; "7 feet 7 1-2 inches in ordinary boots."

JEWISH PERSECUTION.

Inside History of an Event That Horrified the Civilized World.

Pall Mall Gazette.

Last month in every paper published within the limits of civilization appeared a telegram from Morocco announcing that a shocking outrage had been perpetrated on no fewer than eight Jewesses by the order of a British representative. This sudden outburst of Jew-baiting under such distinguished auspices sent a shudder of horror through the world. If "British representatives" took to flogging Jewish maidens naked in Moorish market places, where could the hapless children of the chosen race hope for immunity from the ruthless hatred of their persecutors? Fortunately for the credit of the British name, the publication of the details of the outrage entirely clears Englishmen from any share in the crime; and, as for Jew-baiting, it turns out that the "British representatives" who acted so abominable was so far from being animated by religous bigotry or race prejudice that he was himself a Jew both by creed and descent. The whole story, however, is so suggestive that it is worth while reproducing its leading features from that unexceptionable authority on all Jewish matters, the Jewish World. In the little Moorish town of Casablanca there lives a Jewish family named Amiel. The head of the house, earned his living by acting as interpreter for the British Vice-Consul, was much troubled by the dissolute conduct of his two sons. Like Hophni and Phinehas, they grieved the soul of their father by their scandalous debauchery. Their intrigues with certain well-known Jewesses of light repute were a constant source of sorrow to the old man, and one night at the end of January, when the youngsters returned unusually late from a carouse with their companions, he ventured to expostulate with them. They replied by firing a couple of pistol shots at their father, who, being thoroughly alarmed by the attempt upon his life, fled in haste to the Basha, who at once sent a file of soldiers to arrest the would-be parricides. There was a still resistance, but eventually the young Jews were captured and imprisoned. The next day they each received 600 blows with the bastinado in the presence of their father. His wrath, however, was by no means quenched. Like other fathers who have to mourn the wickedness of unrepentant prodigals, his indignation grew hotter and hotter against the sirens whose charms had wrecked the virtue of his sons. He applied to the Basha to arrest all the Jewish women of bad repute to whom he attributed his children's ruin. The Basha called the Jewish Sheikh, furnished him with a force of soldiers, and gave him a warrant to arrest every Jewess whom the Jew Amiel reasonably suspected of complicity in the ruin of the young Jews who had just been bastinadoed. The Jewish Sheikh, apparently nothing loth, took the soldiers, and that night hauled out of their beds the eight Jewesses whose sufferings have horrified Europe. Of these eight, one is declared to be a Jewish girl of unimpeached respectability, as, indeed, is not unlikely. A Jewish police des mœurs improvised in Morocco can hardly expect to escape the blunders into which the police charged with such duties constantly fall in more civilized lands. Of the other seven they were, to say the least no better than they should be. Next the whole eight were stretched flat in the market-place, face downwards. A Moor held each hand, another stood upon their shoulders, and they were severely flogged by relays of soldiers. One of them is said to have gone mad during the process. When it was over, the wretched women were bundled into jail pending their expulsion from the town. The American Vice-Consul, himself a Jew, interfered, and they were released. That is the whole story, and a very disgusting and horrible story it is, but anything more absolutely different from "persecution" could hardly be imagined. The man Amiel was a Jew, his sons were Jews. The arrests were made by the Jewish Sheikh at the suggestion of the Jew Amiel, and the punishment was inflicted on the Jewesses by the Moors solely at the request of the Jews. Whether Amiel is a fitting person to "represent" this country, even in the humble character of interpreter, is another question.

In Death Not Divided.

Wheeling (W. Va.) Intelligencer.

About ten days ago Mr. Jacob House was obliged to take his bed at the residence of his son-in-law, Mr. F. E. Olmstead, on the Island. There seemed to be an entire collapse of his system, and the old gentleman realized that dissolution was not far distant. His faithful wife nursed him carefully, but the task was too great for her and brought on a heart trouble to which she was subject, so that on Wednesday she was obliged to remain in her bed, and Thursday afternoon she died. Last evening her husband followed her. He was in his 75th year, she in her 73d. For over fifty-two years they had lived happily together, and had anticipated dying very close together; in fact, it was often a theme of conversation with them. When Mr. House was taken ill, his children did not think that there was cause for serious alarm, although he was very feeble, but, after his wife was taken ill, he appeared to sink faster, and seemed to find a source of gratification in the fact that she, with him, was near death's door. Before she was taken ill, he remarked that he feared their anticipation of dying together would not be realized. Thursday he sent word to her, saying, "Good-bye." After her death, he refused to take any nourishment or stimulant, closing his lips against what was offered, although the physicians said that had he taken them, he would probably have rallied.

BONNIE PEG

I.

As I came in by our gate end,
When day was waxin' weary,
O, who came tripping dawn the street,
But bonnie Peg, my dearie!

II.

Her air sae sweet, and shape complete,
Wi' nae proportion wanting
The Queen of Love did never move
Wi' motion mair enchanting.

III.

Wi' linked hands we took the sands
A-down yon winding river;
And, oh! that hour and bonnie bower—
Can I forget it ever?

PLYMOUTH ROCK.

BY MARION HARLAND.

There was nothing in the aspect of the place to show that murder had been done there. The time was ten o'clock on a keen, breezy, brilliantly clear, January morning; the place a handsomely furnished business office. On a rich rug in the middle of the floor stood Plymouth Strong, millionaire and manufacturer, portly, and florid, looking up at his fellow-coloquist with a kindly smile that softened the hard, gray eyes and made his rugged lineage almost comely. The man on whose shoulder his hand lay was of such different mould that one wondered, involuntarily, at the intimacy implied by their relative position and the speaker's tone and words.

"You know"—he said "kneeow," in a nasal drawl—"I would do 'most anything for you, my dear fellow. I'd let you have twice as much, quick as wink, ef I'd one mite o' faith in the concern. It's all wild-cat an' moonshine from top to bottom. An' I mus' say, I'm s'prised you lend your name fur to ballast sech an egg-shell. That's the way good men help on public corruption—a handlin' things they hedn't orter tech with a pair o' tongs."

A restive movement on the part of the listener shook the hand from its resting place. Plymouth Strong clutched his friend's arm with such force as to bring the averted face into view.

"Rafe Field! you ain't a-going to bear malice against me for the first time I've said 'no' to you in thirty-five years? You know I've stood by you through thick an' thin. When I've had a dolar in my pocket you've been welcome to half of it, ef you felt the use of it. But I can't go ag'inst my conscience, man much as I love you. I'd no idee you'd take it so hard."

Ralph Field buttoned his gloves carefully, then his overcoat, up to his chin, spoke quietly and in a lower tone than was his habit, and he was never abrupt or loud. "Heaven forbid that I should force your conscience, Mr. Strong. As to my bearing malice—gentlemen do not use such terms in business conversation. Your refusal to lend me the sum I wish to borrow upon excellent security is a serious embarrassment, which is not mitigated by your protestations of undying friendship. I suppose that the treachery of Judas bore as heavily upon his friend as if he had not kissed while he betrayed Him. Good morning!" It was a cruel speech, sharpened to a finer point by the slight, contemptuous smile, driven home by the contrast between his refined intonations and his companion's provincial dialect. Mr. Field raised his hat in punctilious courtesy at the last words, and left the room.

Plymouth Strong stood rooted to the floor; his jaw dropped and his complexion a livid mulberry, for a minute after the door closed. Then he got back his breath with a hoarse gasp, put up his hand to pull his collar away from the turgid throat. All that was evil and coarse in him came to the surface with the scowl that distorted his visage, the curse he shut in behind the grinding teeth. He struck his call-bell with a vengeful clang. A clerk appeared.

"If Mr. Field ever calls here agin, stop him in the outside office—d'ye hear? I don't want to see him agin—never! Them's my orders, what nothin' won't never change! You ken go!"

This was a friendship that died a violent death with Ralph Field's suave "Good morning." He was very angry, more wounded than offended, and more disappointed thaneither. He had hoped to advance his fortunes by investment in the stock offered him on flattering terms, and he would not have believed any man if he had foretold that Plym. Strong would not only refuse him a favor but presume to lecture him upon business ethics.

"No wonder he lost his temper! Who could have done otherwise in the circumstance?"

Nevertheless, he awoke next day to find that his wrath had burned itself out into cold ashes. He had insulted a well-meaning friend, sneered at one who did not know how to recriminate in kind. It was unchristian and ungentlemanly.

"I feel as if had kicked a faithful Newfoundland for trying to hinder one from taking a surf-bath," he said to his humble self. Breakfast over he went straight down to the "Strong Mills." "You behaved like a man—I like a brute. I am here to ask your pardon!" was the formula in his mind, in bestowing a kindly salutation upon the clerk who left his desk at his approach.

"I am afraid—that is Mr. Strong is particularly engaged just now, Mr. Field," stammered the young man, shamefacedly.

"Ah! Never mind! I can wait a few minutes," said the unsuspecting penitent, picking up a morning paper. In twenty minutes he looked up impatiently. "May I trouble you to see if Mr. Strong is still busy?" The clerk obeyed reluctantly, returned uncomfortable. "I am very sorry, sir, but Mr. Strong will be engaged all the forenoon!"

"Does he know who is here?"

The young man's eyes fell.

"Yes, sir!"

Mr. Field smiled a regretful, contrite gleam. "Never mind! I'll write a line at your desk if you will allow me!" His own business needed his attention, but this splinter must be pulled out of his mind before he could settle to anything else, so he wrote:

Dear Old Friend—I do not blame you for refusing to see me before you know now heartily ashamed I am of my behavior to you yesterday. I come to you to-day for the express purpose of asking your pardon. My only hope, in the recollection of my contemptible conduct and language, is that our friendship is too well seasoned to do more than bend under the strain I have laid upon it. I was in fault throughout. Won't you see me long enough to shake hands and to let me hear you say that you forgive me? Shall we not "make up" in the old-boy fashion? You and I never could hold heat against one another, Plym!

As ever affectionately yours, Rafe.

In three minutes the bearer brought a letter to him, sealed, but not addressed. With a misty smile in his eyes, he tore it open. His note dropped out. It had been read before a line and a half was scrawled on the back:

I will hold no communication whatever with the writer of this letter. He needn't come again. P. S.

The lawyer read it twice with no change of feature. He even observed with a sort of grim humor that an m was missing from the longest word.

"A satisfactory P. S. to my note?" he said, pocketing the paper. "I am obliged to you, Mr. Gale, for your courtesy. Please say to Mr. Strong that it is all right, and we understand one another. Good day!"

For five years there was no change in the attitude of the hostile parties. Both men prospered in wordly gear. Ralph climbed safely rung after rung of professional and political preferment; Plymouth Strong heaped up riches for the children clustering about his knees. Not a word had passed, and not many looks between the two since the hour in which their full-grown and robust affection was stabbed to the heart, first by one, then by the other.

On another January morning, as clear and cold, news came incidentally to the lawyer that the friend of his boyish days lay dying. In ten minutes more he stood at the door of the death-room, entreating from the tearful, irresolute wife, permission to enter. A murmur of the discussion reached the sick man's ears.

"Is that Rafe Field?" he said, with so much of the old, strident deliverance that his wife heard him, and hastened into the chamber, leaving the door ajar.

"Let him come in, ef he's sot his head that way. The sooner he comes, the sooner he'll leave."

Ralph's tall, gray head fell on his breast, as he caught sight of the changed face. Illness had chiseled away the ruggedness, but not softened the expression. The gray eyes were cold and stern, the lines of the mouth tense and straight. As the visitor tried to take his hand he wrapped the sheet about it.

"Well, what's fetched you here?"

In the depth of his pity and penitence Ralph knelt at the bedside, his face on a level with that propped by the pillows. "The desire that we may part in peace, Plym. If only because my mother died in your mother's arms! They are waiting for us in Heaven. The same Lord died for us all. Forgive me in His name, and I will not trouble you longer!"

His forehead fell on the edge of the pillow; except for sobs, and the stertorous respiration of the dying, there was no sound in the room, where wife, children and friends watched for the end.

The sick man's brow knotted, and his features writhed as in a passing spasm. He unwraped his hand and felt feebly along the coverlet for that of the petitioner, who started at the clammy touch.

"Very well! I guess we'll let the matter drop. For your mother's sake. She never called me 'Judas!' Now—go!—won't you? Sarah! I'm faint!"

His wife was ready with a stimulant that brought back light to the eyes, strength to the voice. Ralph Field was recalled from the door by the utterance of his name, clasped the cold hand eagerly and bent down to receive the fraternal farewell. The damp fingers held him fast, the filming gaze was imperative, the gasps between the words intensified their earnestness.

"Understand! if I die—you—are—forgiven! If—I—should—pull—through—after all—the old grudge—stands! I'm Plymouth Rock—to—the—last!"—Congregationalist.

A Dog Story.

"Penelope" writes as follows in the Bristol Mercury:

"I am a real lover of animals and I am always glad to hear any anecdote which prebounds to their credit, if it be authentic; so I am quite disposed to believe what a gentleman told me of his beautiful collie dog, recently. I was stroking his silky black-and-tan coat and admiring his large, affectionate, intelligent eyes, at the same time reading the name and address legibly engraved on his brazen collar, and by way of remark, said, 'Did this ever bring "Scoti" back to you?' 'Only last week,' said my friend, 'I lost him somewhere in Piccadilly. You know how much I rush about in hansom cabs, and Scoti always goes with me—we travel many miles in a week together in this way; but on this occasion I was walking and missed him. Search was in vain. The crowd was great, traffic drowned the sound of my whistle and, after waiting awhile and looking elsewhere, I returned to my companion and sorrowful, yet hoping that he might find his way back. In about two hours after my arrival a hansom cab drove up to the door, and out jumped Scoti. The cabman rang for his fare, and thinking he had somehow captured the runaway, I inquired how and where he found him. "Oh! sir," said cabby, "I didn't hail him at all. He hailed me. I was a-standin close by St. James' Church, a-lookin out for a fare, when in jumps the dog. 'Like his impudence!' says I. So I shouts through the window; but he wouldn't stir. So I gets down and tries to pull him out, and shows him my whip; but he sits still and barks, as much as to say, 'Go on, old man.' As I seizes him by the collar, I reads the name and address. 'All right, my fine gentleman,' says I. 'I'll drive you where you're a-wanted, I dare say.' So I shuts the door, and my gentleman settles hisself with his head just a looking out, and I drives on till I stops at this here gate, when out jumps my passenger, a-clearing the door, and walks in as calm as though he'd been a reg'lar fare." Need I say my friend gave the loquacious cabman a very irregular and liberal fare, and congratulated Scoti on his intelligence—be it instinct, or reason, or whatever it may be—that told him that hansom cabs had often taken him safely home, and therefore a hansom cab would probably do so again, now that he could not find his way and had lost his master. Who shall say that dogs do not reason or reflect?"

THOMAS H. BENTON.

His Encounter in the Senate With Foote.

Ben Perley Poore, in the April Century.

Inferior in intellectual ability to Webster, Clay or Calhoun, Thomas Hart Benton had no superior as a man of iron will and haughty disposition, during the twenty-nine years and seven months that he served continuously in the United States Senate. Aggressive, bold and defiant, he would occasionally strike out recklessly at everything and everybody about him, like the huge wild buffaloes of the Missouri prairies, treading his opponents beneath his feet in his angry rush. His greatest display of ungovernable rage in the senate chamber was when, in an angry debate, he advanced with threatening gestures toward Senator Foote, of Mississippi, who, fearing that he was to be attacked, drew a small pocket-pistol. The sight of this weapon made Benton uncontrollable; and, endeavoring to shake off the grasp of friends who seized him, he shouted: "The cowardly assassin, let him shoot me if he dares. I never carry arms, and he knows it. Let the assassin fire!" After quiet was somewhat restored, Clay suggested that both senators enter into bonds to keep the peace. Upon that Benton arose and exclaimed; "I will rot in jail, sir, before I will do it. No, Sir! I will rot in jail first!" and he proceeded to pour forth a torrent of bitter invective on Foote before he could be quieted. Even when he was defeated in seeking a re-election for the sixth time in the Senate, and was forced to accept a seat in the House of Representatives, Benton failed to display a chastened ambition or a softened heart.

HOT WATER REMEDY.

The Virtues of Hot Water in Cases of Consumption and Dyspepsia.

From the New York Sun.

A young man who was compelled to resign his position in one of the public schools of this city because he was breaking down with consumption, and who has ever since been battling for life, although with little apparent prospect of recovery, was encountered several days ago in a Broadway restaurant.

"I see," he said, "that you seem surprised at my improved appearance. No doubt you wonder what could have caused such a change. Well, it was a very simple remedy—nothing but hot water."

"Hot water?"

"That's all. You remember my telling you that I had tried all the usual remedies. I consulted some of the leading specialists in affections of the lungs in this city, and paid them large fees."

"Now, the only rational explanation of consumption is that it results from defective nutrition. It is always accompanied by malassimilation of food. In nearly every case the stomach is the seat of fermentation that necessarily prevents proper digestion. The first thing to do is to remove the fermentation, and put the stomach into a condition to receive food and dispose of it properly. This is effected by taking water into the stomach, as hot as can be borne, an hour before each meal. This leaves the stomach clean and pure, like a boiler that has been washed out. Then put into the stomach food that is in the highest degree nutritious and the least disposed to fermentation. No food answers this description better than tender beef. A little stale bread may be eaten with it. Drink nothing but pure water, and as little of that at meals as possible. Vegetables, pastry, sweets, tea, coffee, and alcoholic liquor should be avoided. Put tender beef alone into a clean and pure stomach three times a day, and the system will be fortified and built up until the wasting away, that is the chief feature of consumption, ceases and recuperation sets in."

"This reasoning impressed me. I began by taking one cup of hot water an hour before each meal, and gradually increased the dose to three cups. At first it was unpleasant to take, but now I drink it with a relish that I never experienced in drinking the choicest wine. I began to pick up immediately after the new treatment, and gained fourteen pounds within two months. I have gained ground steadily in the trying climate of New York; and I tell you, sir, I feel on a sure way to recovery."

Here an old gentleman who had been standing near, and evidently listening to the conversation, turned to the teacher and said: "This remedy of hot-water drinking has attracted my attention for some time. It has been of immense service in relieving me of a terrible dyspepsia that tormented me for many years. I tried numerous able physicians, and there is probably no medicine that is prescribed for such an ailment which was not given to me; but none of them gave me any permanent benefit. But the simple remedy of drinking hot water, accompanied by a rational regulation of my diet, has entirely cured me, advanced though I am in life. It was not the dieting alone that did it. I had heard that before. It was the use of hot water that cured me, for that made it possible to derive benefit from a judicious diet. I have also found this treatment a great benefit in kidney diseases, which are largely owing to mal-assimilation of food.'

The teacher listened very attentively to the old gentleman's remarks.

"I am glad to learn that your experience," he said, "agrees so fully with mine. I have become acquainted with various cases in which this simple method of treatment has effected permanent cures after all the efforts of the physicians had failed. I am convinced, simply from what I have seen, that almost any disturbance of the human system that results from disorders of the stomach can be alleviated, and, in most instances, cured in the same way. The very simplicity of the thing may cause some to hesitate about attaching much importance to it; but, like the proper ventilation of your dwellings, it may prevent disease and effect cures where all the drugs of the pharmacopœia will fail."

PARIS RAGPICKERS.

Their Work, Their Habits and Their Honesty.

I have said that it has been decreed the ragpickers must go. Why? Well, because the march of civilization has reached that point where it finds an economy of time and money in doing away with their aid in the daily morning work of cleansing Paris of the accumulated filth of the past twenty-fours hours. The thousands of men and women, bent half double under the weight of the vast baskets strapped to their shoulders, who have formed for so many centuries the nasty and yet picturesque feature of the night aspect of the gay capital, as with lantern in hand they, like so many glow-worms, wander about the streets, turning over the dust heaps and garbage piles with their hooked sticks and [illegible] Clichy, or Montmartre.

When the hut that is the home of the ragpicker is reached the night's haul is carefully sorted and classified. In Paris nothing is lost; the bones and half-consumed vegetables, the broken glass and china, even the very corks that the night before have popped merrily from the champagne bottles in some "cabinet particulier," have a value which the chiffonnier knows how to make the most of. The worst that can be said of the corporation is that its members are too fond of the brandy bottle. If they are to be banished from the streets, as is talked of, the belated Parisian whose business or pleasure calls him out toward the wee sma' hours will miss the well known glow of their lanterns, which are always a protection against the night prowlers who infest the streets of the capital and who render even the most populous boulevards so unsafe after midnight.—Correspondence San Francisco Chronicle.

Better than Langtry.

The Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, in speaking of the recent chiarty ball at "Castle Stewart," in Washington, says: An alcove in the ball-room was reserved for the President, who entered during the first piano ectette, and with him were General and Mrs. Sheriden, Miss Lucy Frelinghuysen, and the daughter of Justice Bradley. The stout stubby little figure of General Sheridan excites as much interest in any assembly as the more stately President, and every one is charmed with his pretty young wife. Mrs. Sheridan has light-brown hair, blue eyes, expressive features, and complexion that rivals the Jersey Lily. Altogether Mrs. Sheridan is a prettier woman any day than Mrs Langtry, and people are wondering why they never heard before of her being a decided beauty. She has a slender, graceful figure, and dresses in exquisite taste, her toilet on this occasion being a combination of silver-gray cashmere and pink brocade, over which was worn a hort sleeveless jacket of netted steel beads."

General Notes.

The Dismal swamp is fast losing all its romantic charms under the invasion of utilitarian man. Its morasses are being converted into fertile fields, canals and railroads penetrate it in every direction, and even Lake Drummond, that famed haunt of ghostly maidens, will probably soon be drained.

All the coffee grown in the New World has sprung from a single plant, which a French naval officer carried to Martinique, in 1720, depriving himself of water when parching with thirst in order to nourish his coffee plant. From this one tree, it is said, all the American tropical colonies obtained their seed, which has multiplied to such an extent that Brazil, Mexico and the West Indies produce as much coffee as Java and Ceylon.

Takasivi-Bakin, a Japanese novelist, introduced so many personages in his novels that in order not to get his characters inextricably mixed, it was his habit to surround himself with a number of tiny dolls, appropriately attired, and named after his heroes and heroines. When he had tied a couple together, he knew that he had married them. When he shut them in a box he remembered them dead and buried. When he had put them in a corner of his chamber, he could see they had gone on a journey.

A dog owned in Portland, Me., has quite a fancy for traveling. When the freak takes him he goes abroad the Boston boat and makes a quiet trip of 150 miles by sea. When the boat reaches Boston he disappears in the crowd; but never fails to return and make the homeward trip at night. No one knows where he spends the day after leaving the boat nor how he manages to keep posted on the boat's departure, which is two hours earlier in Winter than in Summer, but he never gets left.

The splendid life-size portrait of Washington painted by Stuart, which hangs in the Senate Chamber in the Connecticut Capitol, has recently undergone a cleansing process. This fine picture was purchased of the artist soon after it was painted, by a vote (in 1800) of the General Assembly, for $1,000. It would now, no doubt, fetch $50,000 if the State could be induced to part with it. Stuart painted it from his original head of Washington, which he sold to Boston, where it hangs in the Athenæum.

The whipping of the students in Harvard college prevailed until 1755, and the instructors were privileged to box the ears of offending ones for several years after. Corporal punishment was succeeded by a peculiar and extensive system of fines. Absence from prayers was punished by a fine of 2d.; absence from public worship by a fine of 6d.; tardiness, 2d.; for going to church before the ringing of the bell, 6d.; for "profane cursing" a fine of 2s. 6d. was imposed; for graduates playing cards, 2s. 6d; lying, 1s. 6d.; going on top of the college, 1s. 6d.; sending for beer, 6d.; fetching beer, 1s. 6d.; for going into the college yard without the proper garb, 9d.

The settlers who have located around Winnipeg in Manitoba, congratulate themselves upon the uniform weather experienced in that region of country. The thermometer indicates from ten to twenty-five degrees below zero all the winter through, and no thaws or warm days ever come to disturb the inhabitants, or induce them to let the fire on the hearth go out. If people can live and be happy in such a country where no fruits will grow and very little in the way of vegetables can be raised, we see no good reason for despairing of the future settlement of Alaska and other arctic regions by people from more southern climes.

A Colorado farmer has invented a duck hunting outfit which discounts the California man's cow. He stripped the hide from a bullock and mounted it on a wire skeleton which looked as natural as a living animal. He cut away the belly of his wire bullock for his body and made two holes through the shoulders to take a sight through. When he wants a duck-shoot he drops his skeleton over his head and starts out for the tulles. He can walk right into a flock of ducks without starting them and has on one or two occasions returned home to his hiding-place full of teal caught with his hands. He never fails to kill as many as he wants.

Editor Wayland, of the National Baptist, Philadelphia, read a paper before the weekly meeting of the Baptist ministers last week. He said a notable feature of modern laws for the punishment of criminals was the agitation for the return to the whipping-post of Moses. "Garrotting and wife-beating is so punished in England and that most justly," said the speaker. After telling of a brutal instance of wife-beating that came under his own observation he said: "I don't know of anything that would please me more than to see that man flogged until up to his ankles in blood. To talk of degrading such a criminal is like talking of corrupting the late Mr. Tweed. I shall favor the whipping-post until the Lord makes a greater change in my views than he usually does."

For the Cook.

Currant jelly is better than cranberries to serve with turkey.

Nice Cookies.—One cup of butter, two cups of sugar, four eggs, three spoonfuls of sweet milk, one heaping teaspoonful of baking powder, and one half of a lemon.

Baked Indian Pudding.—One cup of molasses, six tablespoonfuls of meal, three tablespoonfuls of flour, and one quart of boiling milk. Mix and scald well. Add salt, ginger, cinnamon and raisins before scalding. Bake two hours.

Fruit Pudding.—Chop six apples fine, grate six ounces of stale bread, add six ounces of brown sugar and the same weight of dried currants, washed carefully and floured. Mix all together with six ounces of butter, a cup of milk and two cups of flour, in which a teaspoonful of baking powder is well mixed. Spice to taste, and if necessary add more milk in the mixing. Tie loosely in a pudding bag and boil three hours. Serve with cream sauce. Turn a saucer or plate on the bottom of the kettle and the pudding bag will not stick to it.

Boston Brown Bread.—Two cupfuls of corn meal, one cupful of graham, one third cupful of the best molasses, two cupfuls of sour milk, one teaspoon rounding full of soda, and one teaspoonful of salt. Mix thoroughly, pour into a buttered bread boiler, or tin pail, which should be placed in a kettle of boiling water and cook steadily for five hours. The pail, if used, should be one with a tight cover. The kettle should also be covered, and care taken that the water does not stop boiling. Fill up the kettle with boiling water from time to time as it may be needed.

STEWART'S BODY AT REST.

The True History of the Negotiations For and Final Recovery of the Stolen Body of the Dead Millionaire.

A Good Word for Villard, With a Pleasant Reminiscence of the Days When He was a Poor War Correspondent.

A Notable Autograph Album, With a Number of Charming Extracts Therefrom—Theatrical and Other Gossip.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Jan. 3.—The real facts about the body of A. T. Stewart have been purposely withheld, and various stories have been given to the local papers here to satisfy the curiosity of their readers. Two of the chief of these papers have alleged within the last two months that it has never been recovered from the thieves who stole it from the vault on that dark night five years ago. I am able to-day to give the true story for the first time, and on high authority. The restless remains of the millionaire were recovered more than two years ago, and for a year they have reposed under the cathedral at Garden City, in a special vault so constructed and equipped that if an attempt were made to enter it, the touch would set in motion the chime of bells in the tower above, and ring an alarm to the town. If Judge Hilton's conjectures are correct, the robbers of Stewart's grave were three horsethieves pretty well known in this State and Connecticut. Mrs. Stewart, from the first moment of her discovery that her husband's grave had been desecrated, insisted on the recovery of the body at any price, but Judge Hilton doggedly opposed it, declaring with some show of reason, that public safety required a defiance of the villains, and a refusal to yield to their demands. But in the fall of 1881 (I think it was) an event occurred that woke Judge Hilton up to the peril of further persistence. One of his servants happening to go out of the door at night, discovered some men at the foot of a long ladder that was erected against the side of the mansion. They immediately fled, and he alarmed the household. At the top of the ladder a window was open—the window of the room where slept Judge Hilton's seven-year-old son! Then came an anonymous letter:

"You were in time last night. Next time you will be too late."

Hilton yielded to Mrs. Stewart's view of the case and negotiations were reopened. There was a good deal of shrewd bargaining as to the actual sum of money to be paid, and a spirit exhibited on both sides that must have rejoiced the soul of the great merchant if it was present; but at last the sum of $50,000 was fixed on, and the term, c. o. d. Not precisely, either, for the thieves insisted on getting the money in hand before delivering the body. This condition was accepted by Hilton as no other was offered to him, by the commercial and suspicious parties of the second part. The place selected for the delivery was a small bare hill in Westchester county, commanding the approaches from every side. The directions to Judge Hilton ran virtually thus:

"We will be there at 4 o'clock on Sunday morning with the body. You send one man, unarmed, on foot, with $50,000 for us. When he has given us the money we will leave him in possession of the body."

This programme was actually carried out. A plucky servant of the late Mr. Stewart was selected to complete the purchase. He walked to the top of the hill, and was examined for weapons by masked men, who then accepted the money and departed, leaving the tormented body behind them in a trunk. I have forgotten to say that while the negotiations were pending the villains proved their identity by sending to Judge Hilton a piece of paper exactly the size and shape of the piece of zigzag cloth they had cut from the lining of the rifled coffin they had left behind them in the Stewart vault. So ends the ghastly affair.

Since the recovery of the body Mrs. Stewart is very secluded, and is constantly attended by detectives, who are hardly ever out of her sight. Judge Hilton thrives amazingly. Stewart's great projects of a cheap woman's hotel and a Garden City utopia have both been allowed to go to dismal wreck, but Judge Hilton has, it is alleged, made money by the sweat of his ingenuity, at the rate of more than $1,000,000 a year. The $1,000,000 that Stewart gave him has been turned over and over—ten or twelve times some folks say, but folks will talk. Stewart himself is seldom spoken well of by those who knew him. I know of no more hideous picture of wealth than his hollow life and revolting death and resurrection, or one better calculated to make the poor contented with their lot.

GARFIELD AND MARSHAL NEY.

The human mind hankers for romance. We are not inclined to believe anything with real gusto except the improbable. I see that the story is again current that the illustrious Marshal Ney of France was no other than Michel Rudolph, a humble lieutenant of our Revolutionary war, who ran away from Virginia and from this country in 1785 because his wife "went with a handsomer man." The addition is now made that this Michel Rudolph was a brother of Mrs. Garfield's grandfather. Indeed, Mrs. Garfield's father confirms the report. The yarn is a captivating one. Young Rudolph flying from the scene of his disgrace, full of chagrin and ambition, joining the French army the year Napoleon did, rising through rapid graces, beating the Archduke Charles, storming the castle of Elchingen, wresting victory from defeat, covering the retreat from Moscow, winning the titles of count, marquis, duke and prince, welcoming Napoleon from Elba, holding the center at Waterloo, and finally shot in the gardens of the Luxembourg—I wish so brilliant a fellow had been Mrs. Garfield's great-uncle. I don't know who started the story, but it received some credence twenty years ago from the circumstance that Ney's name was Michel, and that he spoke English, and that Napoleon is alleged to have alluded to him as "My American," though I can find no such thing in his writings. The melancholy fact is that the pretty story is entirely unfounded. Some twelve or fourteen years ago I wrote to Minister Washburne in Paris about it, and asked him to apply to the municipal records of Saar-louis, Ney's reported birthplace. I soon got a letter from him, saying that he had properly referred it, and a month later there came to me from the mayor of Saar-louis a document proving that Ney's parents lived and died in that town, and also a transcript of the church register, showing that the infant Michel Ney was baptized there. What became of poor Michel Rudolph I do not know. He very likely plunged remorsefully into the heart of the Black forest, and there found a comforter in some sympathetic fraulein, and I shouldn't wonder a bit if Castle Garden had entertained more than two of his descendants. "Carry the news to Hiram."

HENRY VILLARD.

I have a warm fellow-feeling for Villard in his perplexities, and entertain no doubt that he will conquer them, and win a fortune for himself yet. I inquired about him this morning. "Nothing dangerous," said my informant; "only that he hasn't been able to sleep more than three or four hours for a week. Insomnia—that's what ails him—resulting from worry and disappointment. He meant to make a fortune for himself and his courageous backers, and he hasn't done it. The failure grieves and puzzles him. To go without sleep is enough to make any man crazy; but Villard is tough and level-headed, and he'll come out of it. The thing that hurts him worst is to see his friends suffer."

It is reported that Villard has not only lost $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 himself, but that he has handed over to other losers the $300,000 that he gave a year ago to his wife, a daughter of William Lloyd Garrison. I hope this is not true. A man should not pay so dearly as that for a miscalculation. There's only one thing that makes me think the report may be true. In the autumn of 1862 he came into the army of the Potomac as a correspondent. I was writing letters to the New York Tribune. His horse was a better one than mine, and he always kept ahead—excepting, perhaps, on a retreat. One night when the army was being transferred from the Rapidan over to Fredericksburg, and Villard and I were trying to keep along with it, we found ourselves a good way from any eligible house and compelled to camp, soldier-fashion, on the ground. We picketed our horses, then brought a dozen nice, soft, three-cornered rails from a worm fence near by, laid them gracefully side by side in the wet grass, as close together as possible, and went to bed. As it was cold, we put our blankets together and laid them over us; and, as there were no mosquitoes, we got along fairly well. The only disturbence was made by Villard. I woke suddenly about 1 o'clock and found Villard sitting up in bed, carefully pushing the blankets out over me and saying "excuse me." This happened three or four times during the night, my conscientious bed-fellow pulling the blankets over me as if he had more than his share, and each time saying "excuse me!" I didn't suppose that such a man as that ever would be rich. Maybe he has been so foolish as to give away his wife's property and start from bed-rock again. Who knows?

LEAVES FROM AN ALBUM.

An autograph album has recently come into my hands which may be called a finished work. It is owned by Mrs. Margaret C. Avery of Boston, and at present is in the custody of her brother, William A. Camp, president of the New York clearing house. It contains the name of almost every well-known man of letters in America, with an original verse. I append a few of these:

I am tired of the etymology that makes "Religion" mean that which binds. It is good Latin and excellent piety to understand by "Religion" that which loosens.

O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

A bird sang sweet and strong
In the top of the tallest tree.
He said: "I pour out my soul in song
For the summer that soon shall be."
But deep in the shady wood
Another bird sang: "I pour
My heart on the solemn solitude
For the springs that return no more."

GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

Yes, in the world's eternal plan
Divinity itself is given
To him who lives or dies for man
And looks within his soul for heaven!

EDMUND FLORENCE STEDMAN.

J. G. Holland writes a good proverb of his that I think the Century has taken for its guide:

Who never walks save where he sees men tracks
Makes no discoveries!

William Lloyd Garrison offers this original verse:

Thy cause, O Liberty, can never fail,
Whether by foes o'erwhelmed or friends betrayed;
Then be its champions of naught afraid—
As God is true they shall at last prevail!
Let base oppressors tremble and turn pale!
They, they alone, may justly be dismayed,
For Truth and Right are at thy side arrayed,
And the whole world shall yet thy triumph hail!

On the next page I. I. Hayes, the Arctic explorer, has written:

The hills were there sungilded at the hour
When other lands were silvered by the moon,
The midnight hour, when down the sun did pour
A flare of light, as elsewhere at the noon!

T. B. Aldrich next has prettily written in a refined, neat back hand, almost microscopic:

Manoah's son, in his blind rage malign,
Tumbling the temple down upon his foes,
Did no such feat as yonder delicate vine
That day by day untired holds up a rose.

Then follow these:

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine out-grown shell by life's unresting sea!

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

And of some wonder-blossom yet we dream,
Whereof the time that is enfolds the seed,
Some flower of light, to which the rose shall seem
A fair and fragile weed.

LUCY LARCOM.

No more than doth the miller there,
Shut in our several cells, do we Know with what waste of beauty rare
Moves every day's machinery.

J. R. LOWELL.

No fate, save by the victim's fault, is low,
For God hath writ all dooms magnificent,
So guilt not traverses His tender will.

R. WALDO EMERSON.

Dear is the minstrel even to hearts of prose;
But he who sets all aspiration free
Is dearer to humanity.

BAYARD TAYLOR.

Strew roses on his breast,
He loved the roses best;
He never cared for lilies or for snow.

WILLIAM WINTER.

If woman seeks for power, then she must yield
The very essence of her being up,
Bow her full heart, throw off its golden shield,
And drain its holiest life to fill the cup,
That, like a brimming goblet, red with wine,
She lavishes upon the world's broad shrine.
Upon the tattered rim men grave her name,
Fling down the empty cup, and this is fame!

ANN S. STEPHENS.

I see no cause but men may pick their teeth,
Though Brutus with a sword did kill himself.

JOHN GILBERT.

By the motes do we know where the sunbeam is slanting;
Through hindering stones speaks the soul of the brook;
Past rustle of leaves we press into the stillness;
Through darkness and void to the Pleiads we look;
One bird-note at dawn, with the night-silence o'er us,
Begins all the morning's magnificent chorus.

MARY MAPES DODGE.

La critique est aisee,
Mais l'art est difficile.

CHRISTINE NILSSON.

One leaf I will take.

SAMUEL ADAMS DRAKE.

From wells where truth in secret lay,
He saw the midnight stars by day.

"O, marvelous gift!" the many cried;
"O, cruel gift!" his voice replied.

The stars were far, and cold, and high,
That glimmered in the noonday sky;

He yearned toward the sun in vain
That warmed the lives of other men.

W. D. HOWELLS.

Love is a day, sweetheart, shining and bright;
It hath its rose dawn ere the morning light;
Its glow and glory of the sudden sun;
Its noontide heat as swift the hours wear on;
Its fall of dew, and silver-lighted night—
Love is a day, sweetheart, shining and bright.

Love, is a life, sweetheart, ending in death.
Is it worth while to mourn its fleeting breath?
Light-footed youth, or sad, forecasting prime,
Joy of young Hope, or grief of later time?
What pain or pleasure stays its parting breath?
Love is a life, sweetheart, ending in death.

LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.

The failures of men are the opportunities of women.

JENNIE CUNNINGHAM CROLY.

Taken all together it strikes me that these sentiments are by no means commonplace. They are mostly brilliant and artistic, and I wish I owned the album.

PLAYS AND PLAY-ACTORS.

Commenting on my last week's letter about "Fanny Davenport and her folks," a gentleman writes me:

"Fanny is just past thirty-eight years old. She made her debut at the Globe theater, Boston, twenty-one years ago last summer. Our residence adjoined that of Mr. Davenport in old Roxbury, and when Fanny was getting ready for her debut one of the youngsters saw her gesticulating in the summer house and screaming 'False Clarence!' 'Mamma, come here quick! Here's [illegible]; here's a crazy lunatic out in the garden!'"

Storm Beaten, the north pole piece, still runs like wildfire, with the "Standing room only" sign, at the Union Square; but Mr. Shook is going to stop it in the booming career and put on Bartley Campbell's new play, A False Step. The action of the comedy takes place chiefly in France and Italy, though the characters are mainly Americans. A play with Charles Coghlan in it, supported by Effie Ellsler, Maude Harrison, Eleanor Carey, Mrs. Phillips, Stoddart and Parselle, ought to succeed whether it is good for anything or not.

Stetson, who found Coghlan a beautiful but useless white elephant at the Fifth Avenue, has retracted his awful oath never to offer a play in New York again, and has contracted for all the American rights to Gilbert & Sullivan's new opera, barring Boston.

CURRENT COMMENT.

There have been a good many threats but no arrests so far for the crime of keeping the Art Loan exhibition open on Sunday. That one day's receipts netted the Bartholdi pedestal fund nearly $1,500. I hear, by the way, that when D. H. Provost, secretary of the Sunday Closing league, handed in his protest against having the Academy of Design open on Sunday, Montague Marks, the secretary of the fund, offered to keep the place closed if the wealthy people who objected to looking at pictures on Sunday would raise $1,000 for the fund. This mode of preventing desecration was flatly refused.

Last Saturday I met Cyrus W. Field on the elevated road. "This is a great institution," he said, "but I wish the cars went twice as fast to-day for I am late to lunch. I lunch with my three brothers to-day—Stephen, Dudley and Henry." These are four "big brothers;" a judge of the supreme court, a lawyer who stands at the head of his profession, an editor and clergyman of sound sense, and a speculator worth $15,000,000. At least three of them have been spoken of for the presidency, and the four are all who survive of a family of ten.

THE TURKS AND THEIR DEAD.

A People Who Believe in Dignified and Unostentatious Mourning—A Description of Their Simple Ceremonies.

CONSTANTINOPLE, Special Correspondence, Nov. 24.—I do not think that in any letter which I have sent you there has been any description of an Ottoman funeral. This is not by any means a cheerful subject, but it is one which tells a good deal of the character of the Turks. He who would learn the customs and ideas of a strange people must see and mix with them in their sorrows as often as in their joys. He would be far from a faithful reporter who would seek only in times of joy for the best characteristics of a race, and who could see more beauty of character in the outward expression of a happy feeling than in the sober, steady, patient endurance of a heavy grief. The East has often been called the home of dignity and in many respects it has well been so called. There is less excess of expression, a less boisterous outward manifestation, both in seasons of joy and sorrow, here than can be found in most countries. There is not more stability, but more dignity. For an explanation of this we have not far to seek. It is in the blind belief in kismet (fate) that its strength lies. What comes must be accepted, and a man is manly in so far as he yields to the force of circumstances uncomplainingly and with dignity. With all the apathy of the East upon him, the victim of a great sorrow, a heavy trial or a sudden reverse of fortune, does not attempt to fight against and withstand the evils that are closing in upon him. He simply bows his head and lets the wave of disaster sweep over him, engulfing all he has or prizes. To move, to oppose, to try to conquer, all are useless—what is to be, is—kismet! He yields, for the hand that has never been taught to withstand is but powerless in the hour of need. He yields, for he is mastered; not by circumstances, but by a long-ingrained idea of the uselessness of resisting. It is here that the meekness of the man and the force of the belief are so clearly visible.

DIGNIFIED MOURNERS.

It is owing to this idea of kismet that the Turk is one of the most dignified of mourners. There is no weeping or wailing to be heard as the corpse is carried from the house to the grave. All is done in a calm, a dignified manner, and but for the murmurings of the imaum, in silence. Immediately the breath has left the body, preparations are made for the funeral, every part of the simple ceremony being hurried on as fast as possible. The sun, if possible, is never allowed to set with a corpse in the house. Within a few hours of the decease the funeral takes place and the sorrow is hidden in cold reserve. The body to be interred is bathed and wrapped in a shroud. A hired coffin, which usually belongs to the mosque, is brought to the house. The body is placed therein and the friends and relatives, having been informed of the calamity that has overtaken a mortal brother or sister, gather inside the house of woe and there in silence await the exit of the cortege. The whole procession directs its way to the mosque. If the deceased was a man, the body is taken into the mosque; if a woman, it is placed upon a marble slab erected for the purpose, outside the mosque for the woman has no soul. The imaum reads a few prayers over the body, and then heads the procession which starts at once for the burial place. During this part of the journey the coffin is invariably borne upon the shoulders, and the bearers are continually changed. At a decently large funeral I do not suppose that the same parties bear the coffin for any three consecutive minutes. Changes are repeatedly made, friends, relatives or strangers indifferently bearing the load upon their shoulders. This custom has its origin in the Moslem doctrine that he who aids in carrying a true believer to the grave, and thus to the seventh heaven, will himself, because of his services thus rendered, be the more easily translated into the presence of the prophet. To change bearers in transit in this way is no easy task; yet it is well and easily done by these people, who seem accustomed to it. Arrived at the grave, the mourners and followers gather round, and the relatives and the imaum remove the body from the coffin, which is thrown on one side, and the corpse is placed in a sitting position in the grave. This is so as to be ready, when the summons of the prophet comes, to go to paradise. The prayers at the grave are "few and short," and the body being covered the assembled crowd dissolves in an orderly way. The priest remains and prays for the easy and gracious transit of the body into heaven. This done, the burying ground is by all concerned in this funeral abandoned, though if weather be fine, is is rare for the graveyard to be empty—for in a land where parks are unknown, the burying-ground serves in their stead. It will be seen from the above brief description that the Turkish funeral is far simpler than the Christian; while still, in nearly every essential point, it is carried out on the same principle. Affection and sorrow and joy have as firm a hold upon the human heart in the East as in the West.

BETWEEN THE LINES.

"Dear Mr. Brown"—I know she meant
"Dear Jack;" that D with sentiment
Is overweighted.
Shy little love! She did not dare;
That flutter in the M shows where
She hesitated.

The darling girl! What loving heed
She gives the strokes; it does not need
Great penetration
To note the lingering, trusting touch;
As if to write to me were such
A consolation.

"The flowers came; so kind of you.
A thousand thanks!" Oh, fie! Miss Prue,
The line betrays you.
You know just there you sent a kiss;
You meant that blot to tell me this,
And it obeys you.

"They gave me such a happy day;
I love them so," she means to say,
"Because you sent them."
But then you see, the page is small;
She wrote in haste—the words—and all—
I know she meant them.

"At night I kept them near me, too,
And dreamt of them," she wrote, "and you,"
But would erase it.
Did she but have one tender thought,
That perished with the blush it brought,
My love would trace it.

"This morning all the buds have blown."
That flourish, surely, is "Your own,"
'Tis written queerly;
She meant it so. Ah! useless task
To hide your love 'neath such a mask
As that "Sincerely."

"Prudence." Those tender curves confess
As much to me as a caress,
And, Pru—you know it;
But then, to tease me, you must add
Your other name, although you had
Scant space to do it.

A dash prolonged across the sheet
To close the page? The little cheat!
No, when she pressed it
She meant its quivering length to say
That she could write to me for aye,
And never end it.

Prue! Love is like the flame that glows
Unseen, till lightly fanned it grows
Too fierce to quell it,
And mine, oh, mine is unconfessed!
But—
That dash and all the rest—
I'll have to tell it.

SOLOMON IN ALL HIS GLORY,

And All His Many Wives, Probably Had No Conception of the Possibilities Pertaining to the Art of Dress.

The Latest Gossip Concerning Gowns and Matters of Like Interest to Readers of the Feminine Persuasion.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Jan. 2.—The cold wave that came the week before Christmas and the snow storm that followed it was a special providence to the fur dealers, and helped them to get rid of a part of their surplus stock of costly fur garments. It is rather a curious fact that if it is not cold before Christmas the fur season (for dealers) is a failure, an arctic temperature afterward failing to restore the market activity. This leaves many fur garments in stock which it is a risk or certain loss to carry over, and might prove disastrous in case of an over-supply of the present long and costly designs. The recent importations in sealskin are very long and simple forms, better adapted to driving than walking. They consist of Newmarket coats, close-cut paletots and Russian pelisses, in place of the dolmans that have been worn so long. They enclose the body in fur, with the aid of a sealskin toque and muff, and are thoroughly protective against snow or wind. Fashion is not allowed to be as capricious as it is commonly thought. When it creates an industry it is obliged to sustain it. Six millions of skins have been obtained from Behring's sea since 1871, and one New York firm alone contracts for 20,000 skins annually. The seal is a very interesting animal, and the ladies who fold the soft, lovely fur about their bodies would do well to learn something of its curious instincts and habits, many of which ally it very nearly to the primitive human. Neither the seal Newmarket nor the long plush cloak are very convenient for walking, unless the dresses worn with them are made short enough to need no lifting in crossing muddy street or in ascending and descending the steps of the elevated roads. It is the custom of all women in walking, and it is a necessity in the streets of New York, to grasp the dress from behind to lift it out of peril at frequent intervals. The amount of strength expended upon this performance alone would rescue from want every needy woman and child if it were put into remunerative work; but the feat becomes difficult and almost impossible when the fingers have to hold within their grasp the thickness of a heavy coat or cloak before reaching the folds of the dress. Women who do not walk or ride on the elevated roads have not this problem to consider, and are saved the anxiety; but they lose the freedom, the fresh air, and the exercise of muscle. The girls have the best of it with warm underwear, cloth tailor-made suits, fur capes and muffs, and toques of cloth trimmed with a band of fur and wing to match. Natural beaver or otter are the furs generally preferred. Certain shades of red—dark or soft shades—are very much used, but not for the street, as formerly. Grays, or gray and brown tints, are better worn this season.

SOME STAGE DRESSES.

It seemed a great pity that the new play, Duty, should have been removed so soon from the stage of the Madison Square theater, for the costumes were very handsome, and some of them worthy of study. Among these was a princesse dress of gray plush, with mantle lined with satin and trimmed with chinchilla; a walking dress of copper brown velvet, with toque, muff, and mantle of plush; a short dress of pearly gray silk, with long cloak and Mother Hubbard bonnet trimmed with seal brown plush, and a white cashmere trimmed with white plush and white satin ribbons. Miss Marie Burroughs, who is distinguished not only for her intelligent acting, but by her good taste in dress, wears beside the gray plush dress mentioned a very handsome black toilet with black lace sleeves and square neck and garniture of jet. The Madison Square is one of those theaters which can usually be relied upon for correct dressing, and this is really one of the uses of the modern stage—one that is understood only by a few actresses in a few theaters anywhere, but is a most effective, if indirect, means of cultivating good ideas in regard to what is suitable to wear at different times and seasons, and also what is always and forever unsuitable. We have extravagant dressing on the stage, the common idea being merely fine clothes, without regard to their expression of ideas or fitness; but there is great room for education both on and off the stage in this respect, and the stage is so powerful an influence in forming public opinion, or rather in creating a public sentiment in regard to matters social and artistic, that its code in dress, if established and known to be based on right principles, would be studied and accepted as unwritten law. As an example of its effect in satirizing ostentatious display may be mentioned the gorgeous costumes worn by Mrs. Florence in The Mighty Dollar, an exhibition which fixes indelibly in the mind of those who witness the performance the idea of vulgarity with display. This it may be supposed is so patent a lesson that it does not require learning; but rules which apply to every other social question are disregarded where dress is concerned, and if women could see the follies and outrages upon good sense and taste as other see them they would very quickly drop them. In this same play of Duty a young wife wears a showy red and yellow dress to please her vulgar and display-loving mother, but takes it off and appears in a white dress to please her husband. But fortunately the red and yellow mania has subsided; we are beginning to get a glimpse of the meaning of harmony of tone in costume, and for aid to obtain this insight women will be largely indebted to Mr. Irving and Ellen Terry.

COMING INTO SOCIETY.

The first season in society, so eagerly anticipated by young girls, is a matter frequently of great anxiety to mammas who are obliged to preserve appearances on a limited allowance, or such occasional doles as they can succeed in extricating from the pockets of their husbands; and a few hints as to methods in such cases may not be out of place. The great difficulty to be met is this: The girl has left school, has passed out of the old circumscribed conditions and relations, and into new ones. She has obtained her growth. She can no longer wear schoolgirl clothes. For years all her natural desire for "pretty things" has been repressed under the plea of waiting until she obtained her freedom from school duly and an accorded place in her little social world. So now she seems to want "everything" all at once—a state of affairs no man could ever be made to understand, so long as his "womankind" had a gown of any kind to stand upright in. But the mother realizes the situation—perhaps she remembers how it was herself—and devotes many hours to the solution of the perplexing problem. To assist it may be said, first, that the two most needful dresses a girl can be provided with are a black and white. The white may be ivory surah and should be trimmed with lace and ribbons; the black, a good satin de Lyon or faille, with square front and sleeves of handsome but not large-patterned Spanish lace. A third dress may be of lined silk, trimmed with lace and ribbons, the lace soft white, the ribbons matching the silk, a contrast—a contrast in color will only lower the tone and vulgarize the whole effect. [illegible] "The bug of war really sets in, however, on" the shoe, the hosiery, the handkerchiefs, and the gloves, all of which are considered particularly indicative in style and quality of the habit of refinement in the wearer. Fine tints, shades and patterns; a texture that is soft and flexible and shapes that improve the forms they cover can only be obtained in best qualities and of special manufacture; and a "lady" habituated to the tone of good society recognizes them as far as she can see them. All this the girl knows by instinct. It is "in the air"—her air—and she feels misrepresented by what is common or inferior. It is, therefore not at all infrequent for girls to receive gifts of pretty handkerchiefs and hosiery, and even shoes of a fine and dainty kind from relatives and and interested friends on the eve of their introduction to society, and it is of great importance that such well-meaning presents should be really of a kind a young girl can use and will be pleased to possess. Colored shoes should not be selected. They should be either ivory white satin or black tint. Colors are only permissible when they match a dress. Handkerchiefs should be fine, dainty, with narrow borders and delicate embroidery; lace are not suitable for young girls. Hosiery may be colored, but it is much better to select black, dark red, or ivory white, as these are sure to be usable, and it should be of silk, spun or pure, according to length of purse. Spun silk hose are warm, can be used with more freedom, and are therefore usually preferred to the thinner and more costly styles, except for evening wear, and then the place is often occupied by fine thread hose, or these may be worn beneath fine silk ones. Too much importance cannot be laid upon the necessity for girls keeping their feet warmly and regularly clothed. There is absolute danger, as well as great risk, in changing, as many girls do, from warm cashmere hose to fine, open-work thread, whenever they go to a "party," perhaps without a carriage or the protection of fur-lined boots. Certainly, the methods adopted with young girls nowadays are bad beyond retrieval; or, rather the want of all method, and the ways into which they are allowed to drift are at total variance with any hope of usefulness in the future. Pale in the morning, with lack-lustre eyes, they come down to a waiting breakfast at 10 or 11 of the clock, lounge about listlessly with a novel till it is time to dress for a round of calls or an afternoon reception, and consider the day a dull or lost one that does not end in a ball or theater party. "Don't ask me," cried a girl, in reply to a request that she would attend a morning class of some sort; "I do not rise before noon, and it is all I can do to drag myself down stairs." She was buttoning herself up in a sealskin coat, and her maid stood ready to put on her boots and hand her muff and furred cap. That same evening she was at a ball, in pale yellow tulle and satin, where she remained till 3 in the morning. And this will be repeated twice a week, at least, during the winter.

AFTERNOON RECEPTIONS.

Ladies who do not go out a great deal are often puzzled in regard to the proper toilet for an occasion to which they attach importance because it does not often occur, and perhaps consult a friend. If it is an afternoon reception, of which there are so many during December and January, the friend says a handsome walking dress will do, and the lady goes and is distressed to find her hostess in full dress and perhaps surrounded by half a dozen friends, who assist her to receive in very low cut satin dresses of the lightest shades, with trains two yards long. Looking at her own dark, simple costume, and remembering the elegant long-trained silk that lies at home in the recesses of trunk or close:, and so seldom sees the light, the lady feels like reproaching her friend for misleading her, until she is consoled by seeing other costumes as samples of her own. Afternoon receptions are still so new that the question of dress for them is not very well understood. Besides, ladies who have afternoon receptions not infrequently close up with a dinner and theater party, or themselves make one of a party to assemble at some other house. This is the excuse for full dress, which is quite out of place—certainly as much so as a dress coat for gentleman "before 6 o'clock. An afternoon reception is often a large and somewhat promiscuous affair, and it is certainly one to which the winter guests are expected to go in day dress, for there is often but slight accommodation for removing wraps; and it is very bad taste indeed for any one to mingle in such an assemblage, at an informal hour, in light satin with long train which lies upon the ground only to be trampled upon, and with bodice so low it leaves neck and arms exposed from throat to finger nails, except the space covered by an inch of strap which connects the back and front together. A dress for a lady "receiving" may be as handsome and rich as the wearer pleases, but during the day it should be short and the bodice square or heart-shaped, or high to the throat, not low. An effective reception dress worn the other day was of pink and silver brocade, with princesse train and half sleeves of black silk velvet. The brocade formed the puffed front of the robe and high puffs to the sleeves, which were plain velvet from the puff to below the elbow, where they were trimmed flat with embroidered lace, which also formed a small Medici collar. An opaline silk, worn on the same occasion, was beaded in a fine and delicate net-work pattern, and ornamented with birds, greenish gray and two together, upon skirt and shoulder. The large detached patterns in brocades cannot be made becoming. They are very ugly, and many will be left, a dead loss, upon the hands of the dealers.

Ball dresses are, as stated in my last, of tulle over satin, with low, solid bodice; and this is worn almost without exception at the fine private and Delmonico balls. Yellow tulle, red tulle, black tulle and grey tulle are employed, but white tulle more than any other. Sometimes the tulle is embroidered, and this embroidery reappears round the neck of the bodice. A black tulle embroidered with small sunflowers, a red tulle dotted with pendant chenille, a yellow tulle spangled over yellow satin, a white tulle fringed with frosted glasses over white satin, a grey tulle garnitured with tulips, were among the toilets at a recent great private ball. But one of the most elegant women in New York, the wife of an artist, wears always black or white. Her handsome dresses come from Paris—a black one this year, a white one the next. When they have done duty as long dresses (always plain trimmed skirts, with square or heart-shaped bodices), they make over into short costumes—morning wrappers or house dresses for summer wear. Always simply yet perfectly dressed, her clothes cost her probably not more than one-fifth the amount expended by many more pretentious dames.

SOME OF THE LUXURIES OF THE MALE TOILET.

The fact has been several times stated in these letters that American women do not take kindly to silk underwear. Much was written and said about it on its first appearance some years ago, and one might have imagined that every other woman had possessed herself immediately of a complete stock of pink, blue and ecru silk undergarments, tied with ribbons and trimmed with Valenciennes lace. As a matter of fact, the sales at the general dry goods stores, frequented by the great majority, were so limited that they ceased to keep silk underwear in stock, and even in some of the best houses it is only supplied to order. The reason for this apparent lack of appreciation of a luxury in which French women delight is less the cost—though, of course, this would limit the sale—than the lack of a good laundry service, and the almost universal prejudice in favor of something that will "wash"—that is to say, in favor of something that can be washed by an unskilled hand without being quite ruined. It is true that the soft silks of which underwear is made can be renovated as easily as cotton, and look more like "new" than any washed cotton, if well done; but the water must be of the proper temperature, the chemical factors rightly introduced, and the heat carefully tested as well as applied under suitable conditions, and the necessity for such exactness the ordinary household laundress cannot be made to understand. Men are better off in this respect, as in most others. The expert laundress devotes herself to their belongings, and receives higher rates than her confreres. There are laundresses also in private families whose services commanded almost as large a stipend as that of the cook, who is a "professional" [illegible] Night robes of plain silk are $30 each, and are not commonly worn. [illegible] Night robes of plain silk, [illegible] are frequently used, and are only half the price—$15. They are also of pongee, in lovely colors, terra cotta, Chinese blue, ecru, and ivory white; are of silk equal in quality to the others; and very neatly made and finished. The absence of the embroidery is to some a recommendation.

Another item of luxury indulged in by the jeunesse doree of New York is the mounting of the white silk or satin suspenders. The ordinary embroidered suspender with fine gilt or gold-plated mounting, sold at $8 or $10, are common enough. But the desideratum consists in white or lavender satin suspenders, delicately painted or embroidered by a fair lady and mounted with solid gold, and often richly-wrought buckles, slides and end pieces. Suspenders of this description are always, of course, in order, and cost sometimes as high as $100. The purchase is not as extravagant as it looks, for the mountings are removable and will last a lifetime. It is not at all uncommon for the mountings upon worn suspenders to be transferred to others, and this is executed, without painting or embroidery, at a cost of $4 to $6, for the latter price satin being used lined with silk.

One of the luxuries of men which women have of late years begun to appreciate and copy is the use of silk and satin linings for wool. Men get the credit of a more practical and sensible mode of dress, partly because they wear their satin and silk inside instead of outside. Silk and satin linings to silk and lace dresses have been common enough; but it was not until the advent of the tailor-made dress that women learned how delightful, how great a luxury it is to have the silk or satin inside and fine wool outside.

HOLIDAY NOVELTIES.

The most expensive gifts made this season consisted of sprays and clasps and pins and buckles of precious stones, such as are now so fashionably applied to the different parts of such toilets as may be classed as really magnificent. The most of these are made of simple diamonds, as these can be made effective at less cost than where the rarer gems are placed in artistic combinations. But sometimes a cat's eye or tiger stone is used for a center, and sometimes rubies and sapphires and yellow diamonds are arranged with exquisite art to produce a flower or winged insect effect.

In silver the newest things are long pins, paper cutters, armlets and the like, copied from the antique forms, and with Arabic or ancient inscriptions. The pins are of two kinds, and are used as clasps, as breastpins, and also as ornaments for the hair.

Hairpins are the most important feature of the ornamentation of the head; they are used more than combs, and by many who do not employ any other decoration. They are varied, but mainly reproduce old forms—spear heads, fans, screens, Japanese, Indian or Egyptian national emblems, and pendant hoops or balls. They are made in shell and amber, in silver and in ivory; but these last are not much in demand. Old silver, dark shell and amber pins are the favorites, and form part of every lady's wardrobe.

The very newest fans are made of the exquisitely tinted and shaded feathers of the merle, with sticks of dark shell, amber or violet wood. Near the top is often a band of pheasant feathers, or these will be used to form a bird, which is poised upon one side. The sticks are very flexible, and when of shell sometimes extend to the top of the fan, but are only visible on the reverse side. Very elegant fans consist of a group of three magnificent ostrich feathers set in a small, graceful standard of carved ivory, shell or wood; but they are more usually made up in fan forms, because smaller feathers can be utilized, and ostrich feathers, like diamonds, double the increase in value with increase in size and fullness. This season feather fans are a great rage. For the time they seem to have driven all others out of the market. Still the knowing ones are buying choice silk and satin ones painted by artists, for which there is little demand now, but which will always be a desirable possession.

The finest thing in ware that has ever made its appearance is a recent production known as "cameo" glass. It consists of double glass, extraordinarily fine and delicate in tint and coloring, with cameo figures upon it in low relief. The work is like that put upon gems, and the cost of a pair of small bottles is $90; of a small, single vase, $60; but as a possession they carry the stamp of high refinement. The French and English china vases take the lead this season, and indeed they have taken it for several years past. The Dresden are neglected and can be bought for a very low price compared with the cost a few years ago.

The holidays have not this season developed anything very remarkable in the way of dress or decoration. The wide-spread depression is responsible perhaps for this lack of enterprise. New effects in ornamentation are produced by braiding narrow satin ribbons in basket-patterns and very pretty Christmas and New Year's baskets for fruit or confectionary are covered in this way, the handles tied with wide satin ribbon in one of the colors, with holiday legend in gold or silver lettering.

MARIO AND HIS WIFE.

London World: There is one good which should not be buried with the bones of Mario, and that is the fact of the fervently affectionate union in which he lived with his wife when both had passed into the very fat middle age which singers cannot escape. In the shortest absence letters between them never failed for a single day, and Grisi used to speak of Mario, who had grown into a kind of superannuated and unwieldy prettiness, with all the tenderness of their most glorious tenor and soprano days. She was a noble looking creature even in those days; the strong black hair, which was simply knotted round her large head, had hardly begun to show gleams of white; and under the great arched eyebrows her gray eyes looked out with the glances of an eagle. She sang in private long after her voice was strained and spoiled. I do not think that Mario's organ really lasted any longer than hers, though the indulgent London public applauded him through his farewell performances with unfailing faith. They were both charming in English society, where, however, their Southern natures were never chilled or subdued. While Mario had something of the repose which stamps, etc., Grisi had the passions of her kind—in politics as well as on the subject of younger sopranos—and she cordially expressed them. I saw her last in her beautiful Florentine home which was full of the relics of two brilliant careers. After her death it was broken up, and a little later Mario began his financial troubles. His three daughters were brought up in English fashion.

THE OLD SOLDIER TRAMP.

Yes, bread! I want bread! You heard what I said;
Yet you stand and you stare,
As if never before came a Tramp to your door
With such insolent air.

Would I work? Never learned—My home it was burned;
And I haven't yet found
Any heart to plow lands and build homes for red hands
That burned mine to the ground.

No bread! you have said?—Then my curse on your head!
And, what shall sting worse,
On that wife at your side, on those babes in their pride,
Fall my seven-fold curse!—

Good bye! I must l'arn to creep into your barn:
Suck your eggs; hide away;
Sneak around like a hound—light a match in your hay—
Limp away through the gray!

Yes, I limp—curse these stones! And then my old bones—
They were riddled with ball
Down at Shiloh. What you? You war wounded thar, too?
Wall, you beat us—that's all.

Yet even my heart with a stout pride will start
As I tramp. For, you see,
No matter which won, it was gallantly done,
And a glorious American victory.

What, kind words and bread? God's smiles on your head!
On your wife, on your babes!—and please, sir, I pray,
You'll pardon me, sir; but that fight trenched me here,
Deep—deeper than sword-cut that day.

Nay, I'll go. Sir, adieu! Tu Tityre * * *. You
Have Augustus for friend,
While I—Yes, read and speak both Latin and Greek;
And talk slang without end.

Hey? Oxford. But, then, when the wild cry for men
Rang out through the gathering night
As a mother that cries for her children and dies,
We two hurried home for the fight.

How noble, my brother, how brave—and—but there—
This tramping about somehow weakens my eyes.
At Shiloh! We stood 'neath that hill by the wood—
It's a graveyard to-day, I surmise.

We stood to the last! And when the strife passed
On his brow, on his breast—what need tell the rest?
You found on his breast [illegible]
What? wounds on your breast? Your brow tells the rest?
You fought at my side [illegible]
On that blazing red border of hell?

My brother! My own! Never king on his throne
Knew a joy like [illegible]
God bless you, my sir! [illegible] your brave Northern wife,
And your beautiful babes, two and three.

GHASTLY GOINGS ON.

A Visit to the Dissecting Room of a St. Louis Medical School—A Spectacle Not Calculated to Raise One's Respect for Human Nature.

ST. LOUIS, Special Correspondence, Jan. 3.—That men may live, dead men must be cut into croquettes, their "innards" examined and their specialties pointed out to admiring and inquiring medical students. Science, for some reason, requires its food in carrion, and is fed with the pauper dead. A man, maid or woman dying without friends in city hospitals is sure to be thrown into a rough pine box, hurried to a college, and there exposed in all its nakedness upon a dissecting table already grimy and ill-smelling with the putrid relics of former auctions, whence it is sold to the highest bidder among the ghouls for cash. Nothing can be more pitiful than the sight of the calm and careless dead in the midst of the obscene golgothas, surrounded by rottenness and corruption, jeered at and appraised as so much merchandise by the lawless and heartless students. There are in this city three medical colleges that claim as legitimate subjects corpses found floating in sewers, the river, or dying unknown at the hospitals, and often unseemly wrangles for a particularly desirable "stiff" occur, and bidding is spirited at dissecting rooms. During the past three months no less than forty-nine poor devils, who had no friends to care for them during illness or after death, have found their way to the post-mortem butchery block in one of the three colleges named, and have there been exposed to the rude gaze of eager, wrangling students, and the keen scalpel of spectacled professors who take delight in dissecting putrid corpses.

A few days ago I made the acquaintance of a medical student of this city, and expressed a desire to visit a dissecting room—I almost wish now that I hadn't, for the sights and smell of this premature charnel-house will not leave me for many a long day. However, to know what becomes of the uncared for dead, I followed my friend into the dissecting rooms of one of the colleges. At the top of a tedious flight of dark stairs a door ushered us into a dimly lighted room, from which a sweetish, sickening odor emanated that cannot be described, but was in itself suggestive of the horrors that take place where it generated. In the dimness made dimmer by the noisome effuvia, the smoke of vile tobacco and the viler cigarette and the smoking of lights, could be indistinctly seen remnants of humanity in all stages of decomposition and mutilation, over which bent, in fiendish glee and ghoulish ferocity, those human beings devoid of all human feeling—medical students. To one who has been taught to reverence the dead and respect the earthly tabernacle of the soul, such a sight is appalling and horrible in the extreme, and I well near succumbed. In my experience as reporter I have seen human forms torn and mangled beyond identification, and have made the acquaintance of odors that were almost sickening; but never before have I met sights and smells that as nearly made me faint as this afternoon's experience.

NOT A PLEASANT PLACE.

Gradually becoming accustomed to the obscurity, long rows of tables on either side of the room were perceived, each furnished with a "subject" and surrounded by a group of eager lookers-on. I ascertained that it is the custom of the students to form themselves into dissecting classes, varying in number from four to six, each, and each class buys a corpse, technically known as a "subject" or stiff. The prices vary, according to demand, supply or the desirable character of the body. For instance, children sell lower than adults. Those upon which post mortem examinations have been held are also somewhat at a discount. Again, when a body begins to putrify it loses its value, and this value is in an inverse ratio to the degree of decomposition. Women are not as high priced as men, when dead, because they contain more fat and do not show up the muscles as well, except in the obstetrical divisions, where they are valued at more than male subjects. Prices vary from $6 to $12 for good subjects. Some sell as low as $1, if very much decomposed, and toward spring are even given away.

The class being formed and ready to work, procures a body from the demonstrator of anatomy, and each student dons a rubber or oilcloth apron and sleeves and proceeds to work. This "work," as it is called, savors of anything but seriousness, and the mockery and irreverence which accompanies it is enough to make the blood run cold in an ordinary human being. The manner in which these poor dead human beings are destroyed, mutilated and hacked by these ruthless barbarians is a sad commentary, not on the demands science sometimes makes of its followers, but on the manner in which perverted nature can deal with the most sacred objects. A hasty glance revealed students busily occupied in scraping superfluous flesh off of bones in order to make them more fit to be mounted into a skeleton. Another was clearing away the debris from a dissected body and sopping up the putrid blood in a large sponge, and playfully throwing it at a companion; while a moment later the air was filled with all sorts of remains, the students engaging in a pitched battle—their missiles being hearts, lungs and other viscera, together with large pieces of flesh, bones and other portions of the subjects they were cutting up. A brain seemed to be regarded as a choice missile, owing to its soft condition. By this time I had become somewhat inured to the sights and odor, and was taken to the pickling vats in the adjoining room. Here my companion took a long pole, on the end of which was a steel hook, and thrusting it into a vat filled with slate-colored liquid, brought up a female "stiff," securely hooked under the arm, and then throwing the corpse into the vat, he said, indifferently:

We only use the vats in warm weather. In the winter time we expose the "stiffs" until they freeze, and they'll keep until we're ready to use them. Do we ever have any trouble? Yes, indeed; but the faculty are responsible, so what care we? Not long since a poor devil was taken to the city hospital, being without friends or relatives in this city, and soon died. His body was turned over to the St. Louis medical college, and was bought by a class that flattered themselves they had secured a remarkably fine subject. Two of the class, preparatory to eviscerating him, removed the skin from the front part of the body, and others removed the scalp for the purpose of opening the skull and removing the brain. The hair was remarkable for its luxuriance and blackness, and was generally commented upon. The skull was sawed open and the brain taken out and demonstrated. The next day a sister of the deceased appeared upon the scene and claimed the body which she knew was at the college. All that was possible was done to dissuade her, but she insisted so much, and finally threatened, that she was told to call the next day and remove the body. The students were told the state of affairs, and at first they refused to surrender so magnificent a subject, but at last reluctantly consented, and proceeded to replace the missing skin by patches from other subjects, and crowned the job by scalping a red-headed subject and sewing it on a black-bearded man. The woman identified her brother only by a scar on his left hand. She kept the matter quiet, and outside the college never a word was whispered.

The anatomical law in this state deprived the student of medicine of one of his most exhilarating and exciting pastimes—that of body snatching. But even a few years ago parties of the students were engaged in this business; not because subjects were dear or difficult to obtain, but in order to have the excitement attendant upon such expeditions, and the constant dread of exposure and punishment which seems to be essential to the lives of some people.

DE HAVEN.

MISS EDGEWORTH'S GRANDMOTHER.

London Letter: Col. Francis Edgeworth was the great-grandfather of Maria Edgeworth. He was an ardent Protestant, and raised a regiment for King William. He was witty, gay and had the two most prominent traits of the Edgeworths, viz.: He was regardless of money and prodigal of wines. He became a great gambler, and once having staked and lost his last penny, he went to his wife, who was sitting with friends in an adjoining room, and asked her to lend him her diamond ear-rings. She gave them to him [illegible]. He returned to the table, staked the jewels, won and won again, till at last he recovered all he had lost. He was so grateful to his wife for her kindly answer, that he made a vow [illegible]. But he evidently did not care a straw for this promise, as we learn that he was discovered shortly after at a [illegible] pulling off straws with a friend and betting on their length. But all the Edgeworths were not such ardent Protestants as this light-hearted colonel.

CROOKSTON, MINNESOTA.

The late cold snap is everywhere called unprecedented, but it is not. People are apt to forget and probably it is just as well to forget unpleasant experiences.

The aggregate fire losses in the United States for the year 1883 were $103,000,000. There were 196 fires where the losses exceeded $100,000. The December fire record shows an aggregate loss of $11,000,000. The fire loss of 1883 was the heaviest, excepting in 1871 and 1872, the year of the Chicago and Boston fire. It is classed by those who have given the subject much attention that at least 80 per cent. of this loss might not have occurred but for carelessness of one sort or another.

At a dinner of Boston merchants the other day, Senator Hoar vividly presented the marvelous growth in business and increase in wealth of the United States. He said what few Americans have ever thought that our accretions were such that "every morning the sun rises on our fifty millions of people there is transferred from income to capital $2,500,000, one-third of the amount laid up by the entire people of the globe" though this vast sum is only five cents a head averaged among fifty millions.

At San Francisco in a suit known as the great debris case of farmer versus miner, Judge Sawyer, of the United States circuit court, has rendered a decision granting the perpetual injunction against hydraulic mining. The defendants were permitted to apply to have the injunction dissolved or modified. The case involved the agricultural prosperity of the entire Sacramento valley and this is the most important decision ever rendered on the Pacific coast. Farmers are holding joyous demonstrations in different parts of the state. Here is a case where a high court rendered a decision in favor of the farmers as against capital and it is not a matter of wonder that joyous demonstrations are held in different parts of the state. But the case goes to the supreme court where the farmers may not fare so well.

The trade depression exists not only throughout this country, but to a greater or less extent throughout the commercial world. Where ever the traveler goes, to Europe, Mexico, South America, the East or the Isles of the sea, he hears the same "melancholy burden" to the song of trade; and everywhere the same reasons are put forward of over-production and over-competition. Too many people wish to live by their brains, and too few are willing to accept the obscurity and drudgery of manual labor; this is certainly one of the chief reasons for the evils complained of. The most obvious means of relief is to encourage agriculture by wise land laws the proper regulation of the carrying trade, and the application of science to lighten and make interesting the farmer's life.

The New York Tribune says that whoever has followed the discussion of the red sunsets, however, must have realized by this time that the limitations of modern science are narrow, and that though even scientific men do not like to acknowledge ignorance perhaps, yet the only absolutely truthful answer that can be given to questions as to the origin of the phenomenon is: "I don't know!" For that is the simple and obvious fact. We have ceased to believe that red sunsets prognosticate war or pestilence, or the death of great men, or the rise or downfall of dynasties, but we know no more than our ancestors did the real cause of these occurrences. Our scientists suggest all manner of explanations, but none of them are more than conjectures, and some of them lack the merit even of plausibility.

The Mormon question will probably arrest the attention of Congress this winter. The Edmund bill put a stigma on polygamy by disfranchising practical polygamists, and in time, would doubtless eradicate the evil. But it is too slow to suit the Gentiles in Utah or the rest of the country, and much severer, and in some cases, unconstitutional remedies are proposed. Senator Edmunds has recently said that when the law was framed, it was supposed that some amendments would be necessary. He now proposes a supplemental law in which the right of female suffrage shall be prohibited in Utah. It is a notable fact that Mormon women, whether the wives of polygamists, or exclusive wives, all uphold polygamy, and it is thought disfranchising women will help things. But after all it is doubtful whether polygamy can be suppressed. It is a religious dogma, and the Mormons have shown that they can suffer and die for a dogma.

England is in much trouble arising from her intervention with the affairs of Egypt, as she has been from a similar cause with other nations during a large period of her history. The bombardment of Alexandria was justified at home on the plea that it was necessary to save British life and property and it was said that as soon as these ends were accomplished, British forces would be withdrawn from the country. But now England is called on to fight the false prophet and save the Khedive from destruction. This necessity seems as urgent as the first, and cannot be evaded. How much better the United States are situated, and will continue, so long as we strictly observe the farewell address of Washington, and avoid all entangling foreign alliances. The youth of this country must be taught to observe and revere the last words of Washington, and also to stamp out any jingo statesman whose counsels are in an opposite direction.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

Washington Special: Senator Sabin arrived here on the morning of the 10th from Minnesota, and has been fully informed as to the extent of the depredations upon his business by the fire at Stillwater. He says the worst feature of it is the delay to his business, because he was amply insured from direct loss. It is unfortunate that the new portion of the works and much of the new machinery, as well as the buildings recently erected, were destroyed, rather than those which were in poorer repairs and older. He received a telegram stating that things are in shape so that contracts now under way can be filled. He seemed to take the misfortune very philosophically, and is as good natured over it as if he had received a windfall instead of a visitation from disaster.

The entire Minnesota delegation, except Senator Sabin, visited the secretary of the interior and commissioner of Indian affairs Wednesday the 9th with reference to sending a number of children to the school of St. Joseph, instead of Milwaukee. It was decided by the department that they will by the 1st of February send to the St. Joseph fifty Indian children, mostly girls, and more, probably by the end of the fiscal year, when the appropriation will justify it.

Mrs. Marion A. Dudley, writing from Washington to the Milwaukee Sentinel says: "Nothing will ever make the regulation cost and bifurcated continuations æsthetic. A senator ought to wear the toga and for dress occasions, the costume of the days of Sir Walter Raleigh has never been improved upon."

C. D. Gillmore, a lawyer of Washington, has begun suit against Carl Schurz, ex-secretary of the interior, for the recovery of $300,000 damages, for disbarring him from practice. The offence, which resulted in his disbarment was the alleged payment of money to a clerk in the general land office in a case in which Gilmore was interested.

The secretary of the treasury has given notice that the principal and accrued interest on $10,000,000 3 per cents, issued under the act approved July 12, 1882, will be paid the 15th of March, 1884, the interest to cease that day.

Curious Expenses of the Senate.

Washington Special: The statement of the receipts and expenditures of the senate the past year shows that during the year 960 quarts of Apollinaris and 516 quarts of [illegible] water were consumed. Of [illegible] quinine pills, 3,100 were swallowed; an average of fifty-five grains to each senator. Only seven and one-quarter gallons of alcohol are recorded, which is a remarkably small quantity, considering the amount of mineral water guzzled. Four dollars and twenty-six cents was paid for a jar of [illegible] paste, and $5 for Doorkeeper Bassett. It cost $385 to furnish the foreign relations committee with a [illegible] globe and $5 for two British almanacs. The committee on education and labor, of which Mr. Blair is the accomplished chairman, [illegible] 75 cents for one dark lantern. Another of the mysterious items "Fine salt, 40 cents." Luncheons during an executive session cost $175; folding of speeches, $8,134; and expenses of committees, $76,901. To cover expenses in defending their rights to seats, Mr. Ingalls got $3,195, Mr. Kellogg $9,550, and Mr. Butler $3,500. The only senator who drew his full commutation of $125 for stationary and periodicals was Mr. McMillan.

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

Monday January 7.

SENATE.—Reconvend after the holiday recess. Little business was done beyond the introduction of bills of minor importance, resolutions calling on cabinet officers for information and the consideration of the new rules; that authorizing the president of the senate to designate a substitute to act three days being adopted.

Senator Gibson of La. introduced a bill to facilitate reform of the civil service, providing for the repeal of all laws limiting the tenure of office of United States district attorneys, justices of supreme courts of territories, surveyors general of public lands, collectors of customs, naval officers and surveyors of ports of entry, and such officers shall be appointed by the president, subject to the approval of the senate, and be renewed at the pleasure of the president. It also provides that such officers furnish bonds every two years, and renew their expiration papers. The president shall, at the opening of congress, submit to the senate the names of such officials removed by him, with reasons for removal in each case.

Tuesday, January 8.

SENATE.—Secretary Lincoln sent to the senate a list of the officers of the army at present on detached service. The total of absentees from their regiments foots up 341. Of these forty-four are at West Point, and fifty-seven on sick leave. Many of them are on staff duty.

The new rules were discussed. A special message was received from the president on Mississippi river improvement.

Provision should be made not only at once, he says, but sufficiently for the undertaking. The Hennepin canal is also included in the recommendation, but not in the positive spirit with which the other scheme is treated Commerce, including, first of all, the important transit of wheat from the upper valley, and cotton from the lower valley, is the capital argument advanced, and really the only one necessary.

The following nominations were confirmed:

Postmasters—Lewis G. Worthington, Little Falls, Minn.; H. Kemper, Perham, Minn.

Receivers of public moneys—James Braden, Indiana, Walla Walla, Wash; Arthur J. Shaw, Lewiston, Idaho; Charles F. Gardner, Sacramento, Cal.; T. J. Sherwood, Marysville, Cal.

Several constitutional amendments were proposed.

Wednesday, January 9.

SENATE.—In the senate the same discussion about the rules was continued. Mr. Frye threw some spice into the dull monotony of the dull proceedings, by an attack upon the commerce committee, which he said should have something better to do than spending its time in distributing a proper proportion of river and harbor money to each congressional district. He declared that the shipping of the country demanded some attention which had declined since 1861. This Senator Vest took to be a reflection upon the confederancy, and was nettled to a characteristic speech. Senator McMillan defended the commerce committee He said there was much difference of opinion in regard to such dues and it was not clear that they should be abolished. With regard to the work of the committee on commerce, Mr. McMillan said that during the last congress it made [illegible] reports [illegible] [illegible] bills would apply to other bills also. The proposition which was to create an [illegible] improvement committee, to take away the jurisdiction of the commerce committee over river and harbor bills, [illegible]

HOUSE.—From the very warm discussion over the preliminary disposition of the president's message and the report of the Mississippi commission in both houses of congress it is evident that congress will find some other work besides tinkering with the tariff. The house devoted almost the entire day to the question of reference. Three committees claimed jurisdiction on this subject—Reagan's committee on commerce. Willis' committee on rivers and harbors, and King's committee on Mississippi river improvement and levees. The gist of the fight lay in the supposition that the reference to the King committee meant what the president recommended—a separate bill and a liberal appropriation for the Mississippi. A warm contest of words for supremacy over this important measure was the result. Over three hours of the session were used up in disposing of the matter, several roll calls being taken before it was finally settled in favor of the committee on rivers and harbors.

Resolutions were adopted instructing the proper committees to inquire into the advisability of retaliatory legislation against countries which exclude American meats. A bill for the relief of Gen. Fitz John Porter was reported. The secretary of the treasury asked for an appropriation of $15,600 for printing $1 and $2 treasury notes. Resolutions of respect to the memory of the late Herr Lasker of Germany were adopted.

Thursday, January 10.

SENATE.—Bills were introduced for the establishment of a United State postal telegraph company; prohibiting the mailing of newspapers containing lottery advertisements to equalize soldiers' bounties; for the construction of the Hennepin canal. Correspondence was laid before the senate showing a bad state of affairs in the Yellowstone park. The resolution requesting the secretary of the interior to suspend the issue of land patents or certificates to the New Orleans Pacific Railroad company until congress investigates was adopted. The new rules were debated, and the clause in rule 26 providing for a committee on internal improvements was stricken out.

Van Wyck of Nebraska called up his resolution to direct the secretary of the interior to abstain from issuing certificates or patents to the New Orleans & Pacific Railway company. Mr. Ingalls of Kansas thought it would be better to "request" the action than to "direct" it. This brought out Van Wyck in his strongest style. He declared that the supreme court of the United States had discovered that only the constitution and the desire of a land grant railroad was the inevitable and irresistable law of the country. He proposed to question the right of the roads to supreme authority.

HOUSE.—A joint resolution was introduced for the immediate appropriation of $10,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi river. Adjourned till the 14th.

Friday, January 11.

SENATE.—Mr. Van Wyck, from the committee on improvement of the Mississippi river, submitted a joint resolution appropriating $1,000 000, to continue the improvements begun by the Mississippi river improvement commission. After debate it was amended to give it in the form of a bill, which passed.

Bills were introduced for postal savings banks and a medical university at Washington under the auspices of the government.

Senator Cullom, of Illinois, made his maiden speech, speaking in support of his bill reorganizing the legislative power of Utah. He vigorously assailed Mormonism.

Mr. Cullom argued that while the Edmunds' commission bill had done some good, it was entirely inadequate, and a more radical policy is needed if the evil is to be eradicated. If the Mormon question is not soon settled, he predicted that war would result.

Senator Brown, on the other hand, opposed the measures, and declared that it and all recent legislation of congress regarding Utah affairs was unconstitutional. Congress had no right to destroy territorial government, and to concede the power would be an exceedingly dangerous precedent. The Christian church, he claimed, was the true medium to deal with the Mormon question. If the millions sent every year for the conversion of polygamists in far off India and China were applied to Utah, the result would soon be apparent.

Senator Garland closed the discussion for the day by comparing the Edmunds bill to the prescription of corn plaster for a case of consumption, but pointed out that the supreme court has laid down the doctrine that people cannot shelter themselves from the consequences of crime by pleading the requirements of religion. The remainder of the new rules were adopted.

Confirmations:

Consuls—Frank H. Mason, Marseilles; Robert J. Stephens, Palermo; George Gifford, Basle; Bollivar J. Pridger, Piedras Negras.

Samuel W. Ferguson, of Mississippi, a member of the Mississippi river commission, vice James B. Eads, resigned.

Registers of Land Offices—Nathaniel Clark, Reed City, Mich.; William H. Brown, Larned, Kan.; Harwell P. Myton, Garden City, Kan.; Alonzo L. Patcher, Oberlin, Kan.

Andrew J. Harrington, receiver of public moneys, Garden City, Kan.

Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE.—Not in session.

Minnesota State Prison Fire.

The Sash, Door and Blind Shop of the Northwestern Car Company, Burned at Stillwater.

At about 10 o'clock Thursday night the 7th fire was discovered inside the prison wall in the sash door and blind shop, and almost instantly swept through the whole building, embracing pattern, hard wood and wagon shops and boiler room. The flames then swept over the engine, blacksmith and cooper shops and all were consumed and total loss. By strenuous efforts of the fire department the building containing a large amount of valuable mouldings and manufactured lumber was saved; also the ironclad building containing patterns of all castings. The cellrooms were not injured, and the prisoners all remained in their cells. The other buildings within were saved—the machine, paint and boiler shops and foundry. The fire was under control at 12:30. The cause of the fire is unknown. The state loss on buildings and Northwestern Manufacturing & Car company on stock are all covered by insurance. The building burned was owned by the state. The fire caught in the wood-working shops of the penitentiary lying west of the engine and boiler room, cooper shop, blacksmith shop and bolt room, and started in the glazing room. The portions destroyed are the new shops erected in 1882. The inspectors for the State have insurance on the shops and all buildings to the amount of $50,000. When the fire burst out and showed its magnitude the warden and his assistants obtained the convicts together in gangs and called out the State militia, who responded under Capt. Merry, fifty strong. The convicts were very docile and no stampede occurred. There was no occasion for removing the convicts from the building, and nothing was done save to take the men out of the cells and chain them. Warden Reed and Deputy Warden Hall were cool and managed the men excellently.

The Northwestern Manufacturing & Car company owned some of the machinery, and the stock on hand. Their loss will foot up between $125,000 and $140,000, about half covered by insurance. The total loss [illegible] The contract for the office work of the First National bank of St. Paul was in the hands of the Northwestern company and the loss on this alone will be $4,000. The insurance of the state on the portion burned is about $12,000. The loss by the state on the portion of the penitentiary burned will foot up about $75,000.

It is said that nearly half of the patents [illegible] been for car couplers, and still that the bulk of car coupling to-day is done with the primitive link and pin.

Board of auditors of the State Agricultural society—N. P. Clarke, St. Cloud; John Byers, Hastings. L. Cowding, Rochester. Those designated with an asterisk are new officers; all others are reappointed.

Capt. C. M. MacCarthy was born of Irish parents in Ontario in 1846. He came to the United States and St. Paul in 1870, after having been admitted to the practice of law at Osgood Hall, Toronto. In St. Paul Capt. MacCarthy, after being admitted to practice, first engaged in the publication of the Western Times. After five years as an editor he resumed the law, at which he has remained ever since. Capt. MacCarthy says he is independent in politics, having cast his first vote for Horace Greeley, and has voted a mixed ticket ever since. He supported Gov. Hubbard in last fall's election.

Gov. Hubbard's Second Term.

Just before 2 o'clock on the afternoon of the 7th a detachment of the Emmet light artillery, under the command of Capt C. M. MacCarthy, accompanied by the First regiment band, marched up to the Exchange street entrance of the capitol. On a given signal, just as the oath of the office was administered to Gov. Hubbard by Judge Berry, in the executive chamber, a salute of seventeen guns was fired by the Emmets from their new pieces, then used for the first time. They then marched into the main hall of the capitol, where about seventy-five spectators had gathered. The governor stepped out from his room and made a short address, thanking the artillery for their mark of respect and asserting his interest in the national guard. In the course of his few remarks he announced that Capt. MacCarthy was to succeed Mr. Hawle as adjutant general of Minnesota. State Treasurer Kittleson was then sworn in, and shortly afterward Attorney General Hahn took the oath of office before Clerk Nichols, of the supreme court.

The monthly report of the State statistical agent of the United States department of agriculture for Jan. 1, 1884, gives the following as the number and prices of horses, cattle and other stock in the State at the present time:

Horses—305,481; average prices, under one year, $35; between one and two years, $55; between two and three years, $80; over three years, $115. Mules—9,940; average prices, under one year, $40; between one and two years, $62.50; between two and three years, $90; over three years, $130. Cows—306,756; average price, $31.50. Oxen and other cattle, 331,260; average price, under one year, $8.25; between one and two years, $15.75; between two and three years, $26; over three years, $40. Sheep—270,190; average price, under one year, $2; over one year, $3.25; number killed by dogs during 1883, 1,348. Hogs—279,682; average price, under one year, $3.25; over one year, $7.50.

The reported increase of horses, mules and sheep has been in about the ordinary ratio. That of cows is considerably in excess, owing to the establishment of a number of additional creameries in the State. Oxen and other cattle show a smaller increase than usual, because of heavy demands for young stock for cattle farms and ranches in Dakota and Montana, and also because of the high price of beef. There are fewer hogs than a year ago, farmers having sold very closely last fall, because of the partial loss of the corn crop and consequent scarcity of feed. Stock of all kinds is reported to be better sheltered and cared for than formerly, and attention is more generally given to the introduction of improved grades. A greater number of full-blooded and high-graded breeding animals have been imported into the State during the year than any former season.

SURVEYOR GENERAL'S REPORT.

The report of M. S. Chandler, United States' surveyor general of Minnesota, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, has just been issued. The surveys embraced in contracts made under the appropriation of March 3, 1881, have been completed with the exception of one township, and the plats and transcrips of field notes transmitted to the general land office. Under the appropriation of Aug. 7, 1882, six contracts have been made for the survey of about 68 miles of standard lines, 150 miles of township lines, and the subdivision of 24 townships. The execution of these surveys were greatly delayed by the deep snow and bad weather of last winter and spring. The number of townships surveyed is 26; of plats made, 26 original, 26 commissioners', and 27 register plats, total, 79. There have been surveyed 52 miles, 25 chains, and 36 links of standard lines; 396 miles, 12 chains, and 37 links of township lines, and 24 miles, 8 chains, and 92 links of township lines resurveyed; 1,312 miles, 21 chains, and 51 links of section lines, and 240 miles, 27 chains, and 58 links of meander lines; total surveyed, 2,025 miles, 15 chains, and 74 links. The total number of acres surveyed during the year is 493,538.09, making the total in the State up to date 41,787,815.91 acres. The aggregate of special deposits made by individuals for survey of public lands for the year, is for field work, $3,123.82, and for office work, $392. Accompanying the report are statements of contracts made under the appropriation for the fiscal year, and contracts chargeable to deposits. Minnesota was assigned $16,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and $20,000 for the year ending June 30, 1883. It is suggested that the best interests of the government will be served by a speedy survey of the timber lands in this State, and their disposal at public sale. The report further suggests that these lands be exempted from the operations of the preemption and homestead laws, and immediate action be taken by congress for their disposal at an appraised valuation.

Ezra Scanton of Pelican Rapids has been arrested and held to the next term of court $250 bonds for illegal voting.

The funeral of Hon. J. A. Wiswell at Mankato occurred at St. John's church on the 30th. He was a partner of the Hon. James Brown in the practice of law, and at the time of his death was the city attorney and a member of the board of education. Mr. Wiswell was the first mayor of Mankato after the act of incorporation, and was twice re-elected to the same office. He was a graduate of Union college, New York class of 1853. Admitted to practice law in 1856 he followed his profession in New York and Wisconsin; coming to Mankato in 1864.

A correspondent of the New York American Field, writing from Hallock, Minn., says: "I do not apprehend that big game is very abundant in this unexplored section. It is difficult to determine. Game is hard to obtain, and the Indians are content with a moderate meat supply. The muskegs and morasses make the country a hard one to hunt over before freezing weather. I have seen several carcasses of moose. Bands of elk are frequently discovered within a dozen or twenty miles of Hallock. Parties who have visited Roseau lake and vicinity, seventy miles off, in September report tracks of all sorts everywhere in great abundance, but dense foliage prevented view of the animals themselves."

Diptheria cases are decreasing in St. Paul, but scarlet fever is slightly on the increase. In December there were 89 cases of diptheria and 18 cases of scarlet fever; since Jan. 1, there have been 15 cases of diptheria and 14 cases of scarlet fever reported to health Officer Hoyt.

More Pension Schemes.

Washington Special: Besides scores of bills granting or increasing pensions in individual cases, thirty-seven bills of a general character have been introduced:

First—To pension the surviving officers, soldiers and sailors (or their surviving widows) who served fourteen days in the various Indian wars between 1790 and 1812, in the war of 1812, and in the war with Mexico; and those who served thirty days in the Creek war of 1835-1836; in the Florida war of 1835-1838; or in the Black Hawk war of 1812.

Second—To increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives from $8 to $12 per month.

Third—To extend for two years the time for filing claims for arrears of pensions under existing laws.

Fourth—To pension all officers, soldiers, sailors and mariners who were taken prisoners of war and confined in confederate prisons, and pay them $2 per day for each day's confinement.

Fifth—To grant a pension of $8 per month to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served between March 4, 1861, and July 1, 1865, who are now or may hereafter become fifty-five years of age.

The possibilities of these pension bills are such that any estimate of the probable cost will be simply hypothetical, but as one guess is just as likely to be approximately correct as another the expense may be put down at $175,000,000.

Commissioner Dudley says that he has made large estimates for the needs of his office because at no time could he tell the exact number of cases he would be called upon to settle, and preferred to ask for a greater sum than appeared necessary rather than be caught in default. His excuse for making large drafts on congress is that, no matter how much money might be voted, the unexpended balance would be covered into the treasury, and nothing could be lost to the government.

Lively Senatorial Spat.

Washington, Special. Saturday evening the 11th a wordy encounter occurred between Senators Logan and Sewell near the senate restaurant. Senator Sewell pleasantly greeted Logan, and remarked in a joking way he hoped he would not again detain the senate with a three days' anti Fitz John Porter speech, as the members were pretty well informed on the subject. Senator Logan grew violently mad, and declared that there were still many senators who were not properly informed on the subject, and he thought he would again make a long address in the Porter case. He wound up with insulting language, saying that no gentleman would have made such a remark, and by asking Mr. Sewell to attend to his own business in the future. Mr. Sewell was overwhelmed with surprise for a moment, but, recovering himself, he retorted in kind, asserted that no gentleman could have found an insult in his remark. Both gentleman assumed an offensive attitude, and were on the point of assaulting each other with their fists, when a number of capitol employes rushed up and interfered. The senators were induced to separate, and an effort was made to hush the matter up, but it leaked out in spite of precautions.

The Failures of Last Week.

There were 325 failures in the United States reported at Bradstreet's during the week ending the 12th—sixty-three more than the preceding week, three more than the corresponding week of 1883, and 142 more than the same week of 1882. The total exceeds the record for any week during the past five years. About 69 per cent. were those of small traders whose capital was less than $5,000. The important failures reported were: M. Wolff & Co., wholesale hats, and R. R. Smith, cotton commission, New York City; Buckley & Co., dry goods, Utica, N. Y.; M. Waterman & Co., commission merchants, and E. Dedrick, bag manufacturer, San Francisco; William E. Phelps, coal and foundry, Elmwood, Ill.; the Union County bank, [illegible] and Klinger & Moore, bankers, Morris, Minn.

Board met pursuant to adjournment

The committee appointed by the Board to inspect the bridge built at East Grand Forks submitted as their report the following, to-wit:

To the Honorable Board of County Commissioners of Polk County, State of Minnesota.

Gentlemen:

We the undersigned a committee appointed by you to inspect the county bridge, known as East Grand Forks bridg, would respectfully submit the following report.

In the first place, we do not recommend the moving of the bridge to any other point, as in our estimation, the present site is better for a bridge than at any point above for a distance of half of a mile.

Upon examination, we find that the bridge is five feet lower than the railroad bridge, being thirty-seven feet above the ice, that the piles under the north end seventeen in number, are twenty-four feet in length, exclusive of that part driven in the ground, with an average diameter of ten inches at the surface of the ground and are insufficiently braced.

Those piles under the south end, fifteen in number, are about twenty feet above ground and are larger than these at the north end.

We would further recommend the building of approaches as on the south end, but a short approach is required probably sixty feet in length, while on the north end an approach one hundred and forty feet in length would make a grade of about one foot in fourteen.

We would also recommend the thorough bracing of the piles under each end of the bridge, and that six additional piles be driven in pairs immediately above the piles at the north end, and that the same be thoroughly braced to the piles already driven, and that four piles be driven at the south end in the same manner.

And furthermore, we would recommend that the Board proceed at once to advertise for bids for the construction of said approaches, driving of piles and bracing as aforesaid.

Signed,

JIM SULLIVAN,
K. NELSON,
C. L. BRAINARD, } Committee.

We would amend the above report by further recommending that the above described bridge be raised five feet above its present height. Signed,

JIM SULLIVAN,
K. NELSON,
C. L. BRAINARD.

On motion the report of the committee was accepted and the Auditor was instructed to advertise for bids for bids for raising said bridge and building the approaches thereto in compliance with the report of the committee.

Liquor licenses were granted F. E. Page & Co., and DeSoriet and Boldrey, at East Grand Forks until May 1, 1884, and their bonds approved.

On motion the Board adjourned until February 12th next.

P. J. McGUIRE,
Clerk.

If we may judge by the reports we have the railroad officials are satisfied that the present existing method is about as good as could be had if, indeed, not better, and so, if we are to get relief from the monopoly, the people must help themselves. The best thing would be an outlet to Duluth, but that can hardly be accomplished before another fall and another crop must be cared for. We see no other way for it but that farmers must raise less wheat and more cattle, sheep and hogs, and that they must raise the whole of their living as much as possible. Farmers must take extra pains to raise only the very best of wheat and that in as good order as possible. Take extra pains to cultivate it well and secure it in good order. The present system of wheat buying is oppressive in the extreme, but it cannot last forever. This country is of too much importance to always lie dormant under the heel of oppression and some way out of the difficulty will yet be found. Until then "learn to labor and to wait!"

The Farmers' Complaints.

Thursday morning the members of the territorial board of grain inspectors, with Gen. Manvel, of the Manitoba railroad, and C. A. Pillsbury, Frank Sterret and Mr. Hulbert, representing the elevator companies, went north on the Manitoba road to investigate the complaints in regard to grade, dockage and shipment of wheat. Major Fleming, president of the board of inspectors, returned this evening and reports that at every station all that could be found of those complaining were examined, and the elevator men and Gen. Manvel explained the situation. A large meeting of farmers was held at Grafton also at Crookston and Grand Forks, and there were explanations by the elevator and railroad men, and it is said that those who make the complaints in nearly every instance express themselves as fully satisfied. They were offered an opportunity to examine the books, both at the local points and at Minneapolis The elevator man alleged that they had lost both on grades and weights. Maj. Fleming expresses the opinion that the majority of the complainants have been misled and have not understood the real reason why their grain was docked, and that the conference will result in much good.

The above item copied from the St. Paul Globe is wrong in several essential particulars, and while it may not have been written with a view to purposely mislead the public as to the exact facts in the case it is as well adopted to that end as if it was written for that express purpose. The report says that "all that could be found of those complaining were examined," which, so far as Crookston is concerned is absolutely false in every particular. The hall was filled with farmers a large majority of whom had a complaint to enter, while not to exceed a half dozen cases were considered owing to lack of time though the meeting was in session four hours. Mr. Pillsbury occupied a great deal of time in the effort to show that the elevator companies and the Millers' Association were not too blame for the losses that these wheat raisers proved that they had sustained, which, if Mr Pillsbury's statements are correct, only shows that the system of wheat-buying is entirely wrong and should be changed at once for the benefit of all concerned, because the wheat raiser is entitled to and should make money by raising wheat, and the buyer is entitled to and should make money as well as the miller who grinds. Mr. Pillsbury said that the elevators and mills have not made money on wheat this fall, our farmers have proved that they have not, and it is patent to all that, up to within a very short time the price of wheat in the eastern markets has been high enough to have allowed the producer, the elevator men and the millers all to have made a good fair profit on the wheat. Of course we do not know how it was at other places along the line of travel, but so far as the farmers here being "fully satisfied" is concerned, we believe that they were "fully satisfied" that the system of wheat buying as practiced by the millers is entirely wrong in every particular as it discriminates against the farmer every time. What our farmers would like to know is if the elevator men are loosing so much on grades all of the time why do they insist on remaining in the market, where, they say they are sure to lose? The fact of the matter is that what the elevator men and millers did say was only a part of the truth and that part which gives the farmer no relief. Several farmers stated that they had been decked from 12½ to 16 lbs per bushel on their wheat yet the glittering generalities offered did not enrich them a cent's worth. One had lost 90 bushels on one carload but he did not leave that room one cent better off. Others had lost in weight and grade yet they did not leave the hall a nickel better off and none even left with the assurance that this state of things would ever be better. The fact of the matter is that the light the farmers got only shows them more plainly than ever that the system is radically wrong and must be changed before any permanent relief can be had.

Getting Ready for a Stampede.

Miles City Journal: X. S. Burke and B. F. Hueniche, representing the Miner's Union of Deadwood, Dakota, which consists of 2,000 miners, went west yesterday morning, enroute to the Cœur D'Alene mountains. While here they tried to make some arrangements with the Northern Pacific railroad as to the rates which this company will give them for the transportation from this point to the mountains of their union. They report that the Union Pacific railroad is working for them to go by that route next spring. They will at once make arrangements for the emigration for these 2,000 miners who will stampede to the mountains as soon as they can get in.

Mr. X. S. Burke was a former resident of Perham, Minn., and left that place in the spring of 1876 with many others to seek his fortune in the Black Hills. By the above it would seem that he is still on the seek.

Farmers and Elevators.

FARGO, Dak, Special Correspondence Pioneer Press Jan. 8.—I find that the controversy over the elevator system of the Northwest which has been going on between the farmers and elevator companies for some time, is attracting widespread attention. It forms the principal topic of interest, and is discussed by nearly everybody. It is talked of on the trains, in the hotels and stores, and business men particularly take a deep interest in the subject, as they are beginning to see the importance of the question and its consequent results. There are four elevators in Fargo and Moorhead, owned and controlled by three different parties. Pillsbury & Hulbert own two, one in each town, the Northern Pacific Elevator company control one in Fargo, and H. G. Finkle, a merchant of Moorhead, owns another. Besides these elevators there are three flour mills, so that the farmers of this section enjoy the advantages of competition, if there be any advantage in it. While there is apparently all the competition that even the most unreasonable farmer could ask for, there is in fact no competition at all in the matter of grades and prices. The managers of the different elevators are seemingly all on the best of terms with each other, and there is a perfect understanding between them that prices are to be the same at all the elevators. There has been an occasional spurt caused by personal jealousy between one of the elevator men and the proprietor of one of the mills, but it only lasted a day or two at a time, and the loss of a few dollars by paying more than the market price usually cooled their jealousies before the farmer could reap much benefit from the rise. The grades are about the same, although Pillsbury & Hulbeurt's elevators show a greater per cent of hard wheat received than the others. There is no particular effort made by either of the companies to obtain wheat. No buyers are kept on the streets to catch the early farmer when he comes to town, but each takes its share as it comes, and makes no effort to capture the business of its neighbor. The manager of one of the line elevators admitted frankly that it was to their interests to keep peace in the family, and he preferred to take his chances on getting his share of wheat without arousing his competitors and thereby provoking a war of prices. The system of grading is practically the same at all the elevators. The managers of the elevator companies here admit, with one exception, that the rate for carrying wheat to Minneapolis and Duluth are too high to correspond with distances and rates east of those places, and say the true remedy for the farmer lies in this fact. They deny, of course, with uplifted hands that the railroads grant them special rates or rebates, and solemnly assert that "inside rates" are a delusion and a snare. But it is a pretty well settled fact that such special privileges do exist on nearly every line in the Northwest, and there are circumstances pointing to the truth of this, which may bear fruit on more extended investigation.

RESPONSIBILITY OF ELEVATOR COMPANIES.

In conversation with Mr. Smith assistant manager of the Northern Pacific Elevator company at Fargo, he brought out the point of responsibility of large elevator companies and claimed that they offered better protection to the farmer than any other means. He cites the fact that the tickets of large companies like the Pillsbury & Hulbert, Northern Pacific or Northwestern, are good negotiable paper anywhere, and the farmer can borrow money at the banks on those tickets as readily as though he held a note endorsed by the companies. When a farmer delivers his wheat to a small dealer he takes a certain risk which he does not assume when he deals with strong, well-established companies. The case of a man named Harris, who went into the wheat business at Litchfield, on the Manitoba road in 1877, an absconded after a time, leaving be hind him holders of thousands of dollars worth of his tickets, was pointed out as a terrible warning to farmers not to trust anybody except large elevators companies. It is true that the agents of an elevator company are not more honest than the general run of humanity and may occasionally be tempted to jump the country with the proceeds of wheat for which other people held tickets, yet the holders lose nothing, as they are protected by the indorsement of the companies themselves. The agent is responsible to his company and the company responsible to its customers. In the case of fire, also, the farmer who has wheat in an elevator belonging to a big company loses nothing if his wheat is destroyed, because the company is responsible for the loss. But Mr. Smith failed to mention the fact that the farmer is charged one-half to one cent per bushel for insurance, and the elevator companies, while pretending to make the entire responsibility upon their own shoulders, in reality assume no risk whatever, as they insure the contents of the elevator at the expense of the farmer.

Fully 80 per cent of the crop tributary to Fargo and Moorhead has already been sold, the most of which was disposed of before the 1st of December. Some wheat is still in the hands of farmers, but the most of it is hypothecated for about all it is worth, and is really in the hands of the elevator companies. The majority of the farmers in this vicinity are large wheat raisers, or what are known as "bonanza" farmers. Very few small farmers have settled in this locality, and the amount of wheat actually sold in the market is comparatively small. The large farmers, almost without exception, sell their own wheat at Duluth or Minneapolis, and ship it on their own account. The only room for complaints is the discrimination in favor of this class by the elevator companies. A man who raises 10,000 or 12,000 bushels of wheat is allowed special privileges which the small, or "one-horse" farmers, as they are called, are not. The big farmer can secure special bins in which to store his wheat, and he is allowed to ship it to the Eastern markets, and take whatever advantage there may be in the matter of grades at those markets. The man who is not so fortunate in the possession of acres, and whose crop is only 1,000 or 1,500 bushels, is nominally allowed to ship in special cars, but he is compelled to accept the grade of the local inspector and returns are made according to the price of that grade in Duluth. While he is nominally given the privilege of shipping his own wheat, the fact is that he must take the local grade and is not allowed to take advantage of the Duluth grade. Application for this privilege by small farmers is very rare, however, for the reason that they cannot afford to wait for returns on the wheat to be sold at Duluth, and are forced from necessity to sell to the local buyers and take local grades and prices.

HOW IT WORKS AT SANBORN.

At Sanborn, about fifty miles above Casselton, on the Northern Pacific road, the Northern Pacific Elevator company has enjoyed a monopoly of the business since the settlement of the country untill this season, when another elevator was erected by the Leaham Lumber and Elevator company, The effect of this competition has been most gratifying to the farmers, I talked to a number of farmers, among whom was Mr. W. D. Palmetier manager of the big farm of Boardman & Lovejoy, who own six and a half sections, and raised 12,000 bushels of wheat this season. Very few complaints were heard, and the general expression was that very much better grades were given since competition set in than before. Last year and the year before there was considerable grumbling on account of low grades, but this year the complaints are very few. When the new elevator was opened for business the old company was almost entirely ignored by the farmers, and the bulk of the wheat went to the new concern. The old company attempted to drive its competitor from the field by advancing prices, and several days farmers enjoyed the benefits of a very lively competition, prices running up as high as 10 cents a bushel above the market. This, while decidedly gratifying to the farmers, was becoming too expensive to the elevator companies, and they held a council of war and patched up a peace. Both companies entered into a solemn compact not to bid against each other for wheat, and each one to have an equal share of all the grain received at that station. Each was to take the wheat that came to it, and if at the end of the week one had received more than the other, returns were to be made to balance the business. The happy scheme worked well for a time, but the pool was short-lived, and in less than a month the contract, so willingly entered into, was broken and competition for business again sprung up. It is a well established fact that during the existence of the pool the system of inspection was more rigid than before or since. Although the existence of the combination was carefully concealed the effect was very quickly noticed by the farmers in the difference in grades. Since then several attempts have been made to form another pool on a different basis, but all have failed and the experiment is not likely to be repeated. A leading business man of Sanborn informed me that so great was the benefits of competition at this point, to the general business interests of the city, that every effort was made by business men and merchants to prevent the formation of another such pool. The fact that such a pool had been formed or was to be formed, although strongly suspected, was new actually known, and the people of Sanborn, as well as the elevator owners, will doubtless be surprised to learn that such was actually the case, and that all the details of the arrangement are known to the Pioneer Press. The practical results of competition an combination are clearly shown in this instance.

HOW A MORTGAGE AFFECTS GRADES.

By a lucky chance I stumbled on a bit of very interesting history in connection with the unique system of mortgaging crops, which is prevalent in this Territory, and nowhere else in the United States. In the newer portions of the Territory the custom of mortgaging a crop of wheat at the time it is sown is a common one, and it frequently is the case where almost the entire crop of a country is thus hypothicated. After the ground has been prepared the wheat is sown and carefully drilled and harrowed in, and then a big morgage, whose generous proportions reach out and cover every grain of seed, is spread over the field. The mortgage is the first thing to welcome the struggling plant as it looks through the brown crust of earth, and it stays right with the crop all through its various stages of development, and never leaves it a moment, day or night. The mortgage rides on the reaper, and sits at the spout of the thresher; it takes its place in the bags as they are loaded on the wagon and sits on the scale beam when the load is weighed in the elevator. It takes its flight only when the last bushel of wheat is safely stored in the warehouse, and the elevator man has the receipts safe in his grasp. A farmer who lives near Sanborn brought his wheat to one of the elevators in that place last fall, and and the inspector, who was a new man and unacquainted with his customer, graded his load, the first of his crop. The wheat was graded No. 1 hard and the work of unloading began, and was about half finished when the owner of the elevator appeared, and on recognizing the farmer, asked what grade had been given on his wheat. On being told it was No. 1 hard, he at once ordered the inspector to reduce the grade to No. 2 hard, which was done in spite of expostulations and protest on the part of the farmer. The grade on that first load established the grade for his entire stock, and he received about 8 cents a bushel less for his wheat than he was actually entitled to. The reason for this arbitary action on the part of the elevator owner was that he held a mortgage on the farmer's crop. Other similar instances have been brought to my knowledge, and they are vouched for by the leading business men of Sanborn, who gave me permission to use their names if necessary to substantiate the truth of the statement. One of the county commissioners of Barnes county also informed me of several transactions of similar nature, which had come under his personal observation the present season, and which he justly characterized as gross outrages upon the rights of farmers who had been compelled to place themselves temporarily in the power of the wheat buyer in order to obtain sufficient means to carry them through the first few seasons.

The Times, Morhead's new paper, has found its way to our table. To say that it is one of the best local papers Clay County ever had is saying a great deal, for Clay County has had some excellent papers. If the Times keeps up its present standard it will deserve the hearty support of every resident of Clay.

County News.

St Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

One of the Red Lake Indians brought to town yesterday, a large black bear, which he shot on the reservation a few miles north of town. Charles G. Rapp purchased the skin, which is a fine one.

We take the following from the McGregor Iowa Times:

MARRIED.—At the residence of the bride's parents, in Ridgeway, Iowa, Dec. 20th, 1883 by the Rev. H. C. Percival, of Cresco, Mr. F. C. Ashall, of St. Hilaire, Minn., to Miss Addie M. Hickey, of Ridgeway, Iowa.

The bride is a daughter of The Times her father being a former Times typo. James S. Hickey, now station agent at Ridgeway. She is a beautiful lady—the pride of her young associates—and we congratulate this young Minnesotian upon capturing the prize he has. The fair one has chosen well. May their matrimonial life be one of extreme pleasure, in the enjoyment of the richest of blessings. Their future home will be at St. Hilaire, Minn., where the pleasures of the cottage home will be realized to the fullest extent.

Indian Chief Moosedung, of the Red Lake Reservation, was in town on Monday purchasing goods and making preparations for a trip to Washington. He informed us through his interpeter that he had been notified by the Indian agent to hold himself in readiness to start at any time. He will be accompanied by ten other members of the Indian council. When questioned regarding the feeling of the Indians upon the Reservation question he said they were all in favor of disposing of the agricultural lands to the government as well as the pine on the timbered portion of the Reservation, but that they strongly objected to being removed to the White Earth Reservation, first because they were not on very friendly terms with the White Earth Indians, and second because game and fish, from which they get their living, is more plentiful upon the Red Lake Reservation than at White Earth. He starts for Red Lake to-day to preside at a council meeting of the braves.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

School recommenced last Monday morning at 9 a. m., under the superintendence of Mr. Thos. Casey, Miss Josie Ames, and Miss May Stewart.

The contest on the piece of land on section 15 of this township, is under way at the Crookston land office. The railroad company have also a finger in the pie, and it is difficult to say who will come out "more than conqueror."

The "show" by DeJudge's "minstrels," at Odd Fellows' hall on Monday evening, was a grand farce. They had our old friend, the "Bohemian," down as "Prof. Francis," who was to perform prodigies on the violin, and this, of course, proved rather a giveaway. Altogether the show was very tame, although not vulgar. We want these show people to understand, once for all, that Fisherites will not patronize forth-rate affairs, but if they have anything worth exhibiting they may come right along, for Fisher can and will put in a respectable mass of critical listeners. Evidently De Judge am no judge—of Fisher taste.

We regret to hear of the death of Tellef Torbyonson. On Tuesday he sent in to ask Dr. Lankester to send him some medicine, and, from the symptoms, the doctor thought the case very serious, and told the messengers that he or Dr. Jackson ought to go and see the man, but they thought it unnecessary. However, they were right, inasmuch as before they arrived home the poor fellow was dead.

NOTICE.

As I still own my share of Crookston Nurseries and purpose to continue the business, I will announce to our former customers and all that are desirous of obtaining Trees and Plants the coming spring that I will sell said stock at prices below any competition. Call and see me before making purchase elsewhere. Residence one block north of Court House, or address P. O. Box 754. Most respectfully, [38-tf] E. W. HASELTINE.

From the Warren Sheaf.

At a meeting of the citizens of Marshall County, held at the Court House, in Warren, Minn., on Saturday, January 5th, 1884, L. G. Wood called the meeting to order and nominated H. G. Palmer for chairman, who stated the object of the meeting to be to take action in regard to the grievances of the farmers of this county and vicinity.

W. R. Edwards was chosen Secretary.

After a general interchange of ideas, it was decided to organize a Farmers' Association.

On motion H. G. Palmer was elected a committee with power to appoint four associates to procure testimony and affidavits from farmers who have suffered from the wrong grading of wheat, and other oppressions at the hands of wheat buyers.

On motion the chair appointed L. G. Wood, W. Smith, and J. H. Hendricks a committee on Constitution and By-Laws, to report at this meeting. During the deliberations of the committee, remarks were made by Messrs. Palmer, Stewart, McCrea, Florer, Perkins and others, concerning what they knew in regard to the wheat market at Warren and other places along this line of road. The report of the committee on Constitution and By-Laws was made and the following were unanimously adopted:

CONSTITUTION AND BY-LAWS OF THE MARSHALL COUNTY FARMERS' ASSOCIATION.

The Complaining Farmers.

That the Farmers Have Real Grievances is Beyond Dispute.

CROOKSTON, Minn. Special Correspondence, Jan. 14.—Since the recent visit of General Manager Manvel and the elevator men to this part of the country, and their meetings with the farmers at various towns on the Manitoba road, the excitement over the wheat question has increased rather than diminished. While the elevator men claim that the farmers, as a rule, were satisfied with the explanation given, and that there is very little ground for complaint, careful investigation and the most patient and impartial inquiry does not bear out their statements.

A LONG HAUL AND LITTLE PROFIT.

I saw a man come into Carman yesterday, driving an ox team with a load of wheat. He was plodding through the snow and icicles half a foot long hung from his beard. While the elevator agent was probing about in the bags on the sled, I asked the farmer how far away he lived. "Thirty miles," said he. I then learned that he had started from home the day before, and as it was then nearly dark he would be two days returning. Thus he would be on the road in marketing his wheat four days, and his expenses for lodging and meals for himself and team was no small item. He had thirty-five bushels of wheat on his sled, and the elevator agent offered him 40 cents a bushel for it! The look of disappointment and despair on the poor fellow's face was enough to wring pity from even the heart of a wheat buyer, but there was no help for him. He said not a word but turned his oxen in the direction of Crookston. The elevator agent informed me that thousands of bushels of wheat sold here the present season had been hauled from twenty-five to thirty-five miles, the most of which was frosted and only brought 40 to 50 cents a bushel. The farmers of this section are for the most part heavily encumbered by mortgages, and it is, on the whole, a long and hard struggle for independence. Under these circumstances the slightest wrong is magnified and exaggerated, and the seed of discontent finds quick soil in the community. That the feeling of dissatisfaction is widespread is not to be doubted; and, unless the proper remedies are soon applied, the results to the Northwest will be anything but gratifying.

SOLID STATEMENT OF FACTS.

I find that there is very good ground for the charges of irregularity and uncertainty in grading wheat, and the trouble is not entirely due to errors of judgment on the part of the local agent. The following statements, some of which are sworn to, show to some extent the trouble that exists among the farmers on the Manitoba road.

A. L. Jackson, of Jackson Bros., of the town of Rels, being sworn says: "They shipped, about the 1st of October, 1883, two car loads of wheat, one of which went to Duluth and graded No. 1 hard, and the other to Minneapolis, which was graded No. 2 hard, blue stem; that for both carloads of wheat above mentioned the agent at the Beltrami elevator, where they were shipped, graded all of said wheat No. 1 hard and offered to buy it at that price. This deponent bought the seed from which the above-mentioned wheat was grown from a member of the Millers' Association, as No. 1 pure Scotch Fife wheat, and paid for it at the rate of $1.30 per bushel of of sixty-one pounds, in the City of Crookston.

Mr. Jackson further swears as follows: That at various times since Nov. 6, 1883, the date of this writing, he has asked for storage tickets for his No. 1 hard wheat at the elevator of the Sterrett Elevator Company at Beltrami, and has been refused tickets for better grade than No. 2 hard, the agent saying that he had orders not to give storage tickets on No. 1 hard wheat better than No. 2 hard; that the agent paid this deponent No. 1 hard prices for each and every load of wheat for which he asked storage tickets and was refused better than No. 2 hard grade if stored. And further, this deponent says he has made application in person to the agent of the above named elevator company at Rolette, and has received the same answer as that given him by the agent at Beltrami; that the agent of the above named elevator company at Ada has been asked by this deponent if he gave No. 1 hard storage tickets for No. 1 hard wheat when asked, and that the agent answered that he did.

H. H. Jackson, being sworn, says that on the 6th day of November, 1883, he demanded of the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad Company, through their agent at Rolette station, a car in which to ship wheat and was refused.

Sewell P. Norton being sworn, says that on the 26th and 27th days of September, 1883, he hauled two car loads of No. 1 Scotch Fife wheat, a majority of which was raised on summer fallow, to the station at Beltrami; that the agent there gave as his opinion that it was No. 1 hard wheat; that the agent shipped on or about the 7th day of October, two cars for this deponent, and that upon receipt of a letter dated Oct. 13, 1883, from A. B. Taylor & Co. of Minneapolis said A. B. Taylor & Co. state that "blue stem wheat will not grade No. 1 hard here, and is very poor for milling purposes, and hard to sell."

Edwin Frantz swears that he helped to deliver the above mentioned wheat to the elevator at Beltrami, and that Haight, the purchasing agent of the Sterrett elevator company, told him that the wheat was No. 1 hard, and that he would buy it as such.

Wallace Bros. of Drayton, who own large farms near there, raised a large amount of wheat this year and began shipping to Grand Forks, [illegible]. The first two loads were graded as frosted, and they received 40 cents a bushel or 33 cents net. They then shipped it direct to a commission house in Minneapolis, and the proceeds netted them, above all expense of shipping and selling, 52 cents a bushel.

HE TESTED THE INSPECTOR.

Capt. E. B. Reeves, of Grand Forks not being satisfied that he was receiving as good grade for his wheat as he ought, concluded to see if the inspector really knew his business. To this end Capt. Reeves brought in a sample of pure Fife wheat, which he had bought for seed, and which cost him $1.10 a bushel, and the inspector promptly graded it No. 2 hard and offered him 73 cents a bushel for it. Samples of this wheat show it to be pure hard wheat, clean and nice. It is needless to say that Capt. Reeves did not sell his seed at the price offered.

An old man named Dangerfield, living near Grand Forks, says he took a load of wheat to Grand Forks and was offered No. 1 regular for it. He refused to take it, and hauled the wheat home again. The next morning his son hitched his own team to the same load, took it to town, and sold it to the man who refused it the day before for No. 1 hard. I was not able to verify this statement, but I have the word of Capt. Brown, president of the Grand Forks chamber of commerce, for the truth of it, and he says Mr. Dangerfield is a perfectly reliable and honest man, and is willing to make oath to this statement.

Mr. E. D. Childs, of Carman, says the tenant on one of his farms raised 1,800 bushels of wheat on shares. The wheat was divided by the tenant taking every alternate sack as it came from the spout of the thresher, Mr. Childs taking the other. The tenant sold 300 bushels of his wheat as soon as it was threshed, at the Sterrett elevator at Beltrami and received No. 1 hard grade. Mr. Childs shipped two cars of his share of the crop to Minneapolis, and the inspector there gave him No. 2 hard on one car, and No. 1 hard, with one pound off for cleaning, on the other.

TROUBLE ABOUT WEIGHT.

Jackson Bros. of Crookston shipped two cars of wheat last fall on their own account—one to Duluth and one to Minneapolis. On the former they lost thirty bushels in weight and on the latter ninety bushels. The wheat was shipped through the Sterrett elevator at Beltrami. At the meeting here on Wednesday this matter was brought and Mr. Manvel said that his attention having been called to the matter, he had traced it up and found the facts to be as follows: The elevator agent, who by the way is vouched for by his neighbors as an honest man, is positive in his assertion that the weights of the cars were correct when they left Beltrami. The railroad agent says the cars were sealed before they left, and the agent at Duluth reported the seals in good order on the arrival of the car there. The loss was not discovered until the wheat was weighed into the elevator at Duluth. The loss had never been placed, and Mr. Jackson had not received any satisfaction for his ninety bushels of wheat. Mr. Sterrett declined to assume the loss, but Mr. Manvel proposed to make it good, and divide the expense between the elevator at Beltrami, the railroad company and the Duluth elevator.

MR. MANVEL'S INVESTIGATION.

I find that, as a general thing, Mr. Manvel is credited with fairness in his dealings toward the farmers. He issued orders to conductors to bring all farmers who desired to attend the Crookston meeting free, and in all his statements showed a disposition to right any wrong that might be brought to his knowledge. He offered to prove to the satisfaction of the farmers the truth of his assertion that his company could not afford to carry freight any cheaper than it is now doing, and tendered free transportation to any committee the farmers might send to St. Paul to investigate the question, and afford them every opportunity for doing so. He also stated that where a farmer thought he was not receiving justice in the matter of grades and prices, he should demand a separate bin in the elevator, and if no empty bins could be had, then, upon application, he would be furnished with a car in which to ship his wheat. He also promised to thoroughly investigate every charge that had a foundation of fact and in every way showed a disposition of fairness that was heartily approved by everybody who heard him. Still he did not convince the farmers that the policy of the road in the matter of freight transportation was a wise one, and the dissatisfaction on that score exists in spite of all his arguments.

It is claimed by farmers and business men generally that the elevator men did not dispose of the complaints presented satisfactorily. They say the elevator men simply made excuses for the existing state of things, but did not propose a remedy; that the so-called investigation was not conducted in such such a manner as to convince the farmers that the present system of grading and handling their wheat is the right one. While this may be true or not, the following facts exist beyond doubt.

The railroad and elevator companies of this section of the Northwest enjoy a complete monopoly of the facilities for handling the crops. It is a fact beyond dispute that the farmers of the Northwest are compelled to ship their grain through the elevators of the few companies that control the business, and they are not allowed, as a rule, to ship their own grain to the Eastern markets and avail themselves of the benefits which may exist by doing so. It is a fact that discrimination is practised in favor of the large farmer and against the small one, and it is also a fact that the farmer who can market his own wheat gets more for his crop than the one who does not. It is stated by the elevator companies that the crops of the Northwest cannot be as successfully marketed in the East as at Minneapolis, and that there is no shipping margin between the price of wheat in the country and the Eastern markets. While this is true to a great extent, there must be a reason for it. In the first place, very little of the pure hard wheat of the hard wheat belt ever reaches the Eastern markets in its original condition. The hard wheat on the line of the Northern Pacific road goes into the elevators at Duluth and is there mixed with lower grades and its real value for milling purposes greatly reduced by the process. The most of the hard wheat on the line of the Manitoba road, north of the Northern Pacific road, goes to the mills at Minneapolis, and that which does not go to the mills in its original state is handled and mixed in the elevators there and at St. Paul and its quality greatly reduced. The minimum of the grade of No. 1 hard wheat is a clear, sound grain, weighing 58 pounds to the bushel and being 90 per cent pure hard wheat.

REDUCING THE GRADE.

I have found by the most careful inquiry that the greater portion of the wheat raised in the hard wheat territory is much better than this standard. At many places along the line of the Manitoba road, wheat taken for No 1 hard frequently weighs 62 and even 64 pounds to the bushel, and a very small per cent. of it weighs less than 60 pounds. It is, therefore, easy to see how this wheat, weighing 62 pounds, can be mixed with the lower grades and brought down to the standard of 58 pounds, and still retain its technical grade of No 1 hard. In Milwaukee and Chicago this process is repeated to reduce this grade to the standard of No. 2, and bring up the Eastern lower grades, until all identity as No. 1 hard wheat is lost. I have seen wheat tested in the elevators on the line of the Manitoba road, which weighed 61 pounds to the bushel, was clean and sound, but which graded as No. 2 hard in Minneapolis. At one elevator at Crookston, out of 120,000 bushels of wheat received this year, more than 75 per cent of the grade taken as No. 1 hard weighed 62 pounds to the bushel and less than 5 per cent. weighed less than 60 pounds. Yet it is a fact that this wheat has been graded as No. 2 hard and even No. 1 soft at Duluth and Minneapolis. While Mr. Pillsbury and Mr. Hulbert show by their books that they have lost on grades in Minneapolis, the wheat has really gone to the mills there, and been converted into flour worth a premium the world over. And while it is true that the Millers' Association and Mr. C. A. Pillsbury, as a miller, can give better grades than they receive, it is something of a problem to know how Mr. Hulbert, as a partner of the elevator company, is going to make any money, and how Mr. Sterrett, who is not a miller, is going to come out on his paole. Elevator agents, almost without exception complain that they are unable to maintain a uniform system of grades, and all, without exception, complain loudly of the inequality of Minneapolis and Duluth grades. In one elevator I saw a bin of clean, bright, hard wheat, which weighed 60 pounds to the bushel, and which the books showed had been bought as No. 1 hard. But the elevator agent showed me returns of what he declared to be the same wheat, which graded as No. 2 hard and No. 1 soft at Minneapolis. Another agent showed me the entry of a purchase of a lot of soft and smutty wheat, which was sent to Minneapolis and graded No. 1 hard. He also stated that he had shipped No. 1 hard, which weighed 60 pounds to the bushel, which was graded as No. 1 soft, a loss of two grades. Such instances are the rule, not the exception, and the facts cannot be successfully disputed.

It is a fact, which Mr. Pillsbury admitted, that at the beginning of the crop season, grades at Minneapolis and Duluth were much more liberal than later, when the supply was greater and the demand diminished. An instance of this came under my observation at Carman. A farmer drove up to the elevator door with a load of wheat and the buyer offered him No. 3 grade for it. The farmer remonstrated, saying he had received No. 1 regular for the same wheat a few weeks before. The buyer admitted that such was the case, but explained it by saying that at the time this same wheat was graded No. 1 he had no difficulty in obtaining the same grade for it at Minneapolis, but the inspection there had changed, and he could now get nothing better than No. 3 for it. The farmer was not satisfied with the explanation, and drove off with his load. The buyer said he had stated the truth, and was not to blame for it. He said that at the beginning of the season he had no difficulty in passing as No. 1 hard in St. Paul, Minneapolis or Duluth wheat that would now barely go No. 1 regular. He insisted that this inequality in grades at those points was a great injustice, and tended to confuse the country buyer and make his life a burden and cause the deepest dissatisfaction among farmers. There can be no doubt that the results of this system are far reaching and disastrous. The elevator agents along the line in the early part of the season grade according to their honest judgment, but later, when the bulk of the crop is moving, and the inspection at Duluth Minneapolis and St. Paul stiffen up become frightened, and under instructions from their employes to buy so their grades will hold out, refuse for days at a time to grade anything above No. 2 hard no matter what the quality offered may be.

ALLEGED COMPETITION.

I am well convinced that on the lines of the Manitoba road no such thing as competition exists, except where there are mills of sufficient capacity to affect the supply of the markets. In small towns where there are more than one elevator, the farmer is very little, if any, benefited; and are no better off than they are where only one elevator exists. Mr Pillsbury claims, and the books show it to be true, that the grades given by his elevator, where he has a monopoly are better than points where there are more than one. The only exception I have found to this rule is at Fargo, and this may be explained by the competition in shipping facilities. The explanation given by Mr. Pillsbury is that being anxious to show the farmers that he does not take advantage of his monopoly, he gives them better grades at places where he has the only house than where there are more than one. If this be true, then it is apparent that there is collusion between the elevator companies, and that they combine to keep grades down. The price of wheat is not at all affected by the so-called competition. At Grand Forks, where there are mills with large capacity, the price of wheat is often raised above the market, but here at Crookston prices are no better than at stations where there is only one house, and grades are practically the same. In fact, I am well convinced, and I do not think the elevator proprietors will dispute the assertion, that on certain portions of the Manitoba road the earnings, as well as expenses of the elevators, are pooled and the business divided equally between them. Under these circumstances the farmer finds little comfort in the fact that his market is provided with "independent" elevators.

FROZEN WHEAT.

Along the Red River valley, north of the Northern Pacific road, the farmers have suffered much from the early frost of September last. There is no doubt that this frosted wheat scare has wrought more disastrous results to the farmers of this section than the facts justify. While it is true that a small proportion of the wheat up here is badly damaged and practically worthless for flour, a great deal of the grain called frosted is damaged very little. Any grain that has suffered from too sudden ripening after the late rains, or shows the slightest signs of damage from any other cause, is at once spotted as "frosted" and brings only about half the market price. Elevator agents take advantage of this fact to cheapen grades, and the prices actually paid for some of this damaged grain is astonishingly low. I saw 12,000 bushels of what is called frosted wheat in one elevator. The agent informed me that the average price for that wheat was 40 cents, and that he had sold 9,000 bushels of a similar lot at an average price of 85 cents. Commission men admit that there is more profit in handling this frosted stuff than the better grades, as it is sold by samples, and in the hands of a skillful elevator man it can be cleaned, and made to bring a fair price in the open market. At this place Pillsbury & Hulbert are taking about all that comes in, the other elevators refusing it, while at other points the reverse is true. This is a disaster which cannot be laid at the doors of the railroads or elevators, and the only hope of relief the farmer can have in this case is at the hands of a merciful Providence, to whom all complaints on this score should be directed.

Mr. Pillsbury's Defense.

MINNEAPOLIS, Jan. 19.—To the Editor: I wish to refer to your Crookston correspondence of this morning. There is little to answer as regards our elevators, as most of the farmers are not being used well at other elevators than ours. I think in every case when he has referred to our elevators he has either been mistaken or the printers have made errors. He mentions the matter of a man being docked fourteen pounds to the bushel at Beltrami. We have no elevator at Beltrami, and never had. There was a man at Crookston who said he had been docked fourteen pounds to the bushel at our Angus elevator. But he acknowledged at Crookston—a very important thing which seems not to have been stated to your correspondent—that he had made his complaint at Minneapolis, and it had been settled long before the Crookston meeting, and before there was any agitation. But I must say further about this transaction that the agent at Angus had worked for us only about a week when the elevator burned and the wheat with it. It is possible that this wheat should have been docked fourteen pounds. I have seen wheat that ought to be so docked and more too. But as the farmer thought he had been wronged and the wheat was burned and no way of testing it, we took his word and paid his claim. It looks like straining the thing a little to bring this up as a case of injustice.

Speaking of frozen wheat he says he found at one place 12,000 bushels of frosted wheat that the agent informed him had been taken at an average of 40 cents and that he had sold 9,000 bushels of a similar lot at 85 cents. He intimates that this was one of our elevators as he says that Pillsbury & Hulbert have taken nearly all that came to that place. Now the correspondent is entirely off or the printer mixed his figures. We have bought no wheat at an average of 40 cents nor within 10 cents per bushel of it, and we have sold no such wheat that would net in the country within 25 cents of the figure he names, 85 cents. In fact, on account of buying the wheat on a declining market, we have lost money on it as we had to sell on this market, it being unfit to grind into our standard brands of flour. We cannot think your correspondent meant what the printed matter says, but think the printers made some error, because No. 1 hard has not averaged 85 cents up in the country.

Another thing. He says that Mr. Pillsbury admitted that at the beginning of the crop season grades in Minneapolis were much more liberal than later, when the supply was greater and the demand diminished. I never made such a statement. I did state that at Duluth, when the season opened, the grade was more liberal than at Minneapolis, but when the heavy movement began Duluth was compelled to stiffen up on grade, so that Minneapolis was more liberal. But my statement has been distorted to the effect that the Minneapolis grade has been changed.

CHARLES A. PILLSBURY.

COMMENT BY THE CORRESPONDENT.

Mr. Pillsbury makes the mistake of assuming that the present investigation of the elevator system is confined exclusively to his own line. This is not true, as the complaints heard in the country are not directed against any one particular line of elevators, except where they have complete monopoly of the business. It is true, that what applies to Pillsbury & Hulbert's elevators on the Manitoba road, applies as a rule, to all others, as where there is more than one house, the business is pooled and competition exists in name only. For instance, from Ada north to St. Vincent the Sterrett Elevator company of St. Paul owns and operates a line of elevators, and is supposed to be in actual competition with Pillsbury & Hulbert. But this idea is a delusion and a snare. The Sterrett Elevator company buys principally for the millers' association, and the business of both elevator companies, where they are alleged to be in competition, is pooled. Not only is the business pooled, but the expenses down to the smallest item are divided equally, so that there is no such thing as competition; but the wheat-buying business on that portion of the road, at least, is as complete a monopoly, as though only one company owned all the elevators. When a farmer drives his load to one elevator on this line, and not being satisfied with the price or grade, goes to an opposition house in the hope of receiving more favorable treatment he finds himself no better off, and has had his trouble for nothing. It is not believed that Mr. Manvel is aware of the extent of this pooling system. If he is not, the Pioneer Press will be glad to furnish him with unassailable proof of the facts as they exist. While it is believed that this pooling arrangement is in practice on all portions of the road, absolute proof of the fact has not yet been obtained.

THE FROSTED WHEAT.

It was not claimed that the 12,000 bushels of frosted wheat spoken of were found in one of Pillsbury & Hulbert's elevators. This particular wheat was not in one of their houses, but I found plenty of this wheat in their elevators at other points on the line. At Crookston, the Sterrett elevator is refusing this wheat, which all goes to Pillsbury & Hulbert's elevator, and is taken in at from 35 to 50 cents a bushel. It was not stated that the 9,000 bushels of frosted wheat sold at an average of 85 cents in the country.

It is beyond question that this frozen wheat crop has been used to the great disadvantage of the farmers of the Northwest. It is not denied that some of the wheat along the Manitoba road and the Northern Pacific has been so badly injured as to render it unfit for milling purposes, but it is an actual fact that the proportion of wheat damaged to this extent is less than 10 per cent of the crop. It has been demonstrated that the presence of 10 per cent of frosted in good wheat does not materially injure its value for milling purposes; but it is a fact that cannot be denied, that good, sound wheat, containing this amount, or even less of frosted stuff, is graded as rejected in the country on account of being frosted has sold on the Minneapolis chamber of commerce for 90 cents a bushel, and such wheat has sold in this market the past week at about the same price as No. 1 regular. Under the present system of elevator monopoly the farmers are compelled to take what they can get for their wheat. The advantages of a free market, in this connection are obvious.

THE VARIATION IN GRADES.

In the matter of grades, Mr. Pillsbury stated to the correspondent that at the beginning of the season, when everybody wanted wheat, Duluth grades were so liberal that it was difficult to bring the wheat to Minneapolis. To offset the effect of Duluth grading the grades were lowered by the millers' association to the standard of Duluth grades and kept there until the flow of wheat was turned in this direction. Mr. Pillsbury also stated that when the supply of wheat became large and the demand was lessened, the millers' association made an attempt to raise the standard of grading, but he objected and insisted on the loose standard being maintained. The reason he gave for this opposition on his part was the fact that the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator company had then in their elevators in the country a large quantity of wheat which had been bought on the liberal grade, and the elevator company would sustain a heavy loss if compelled to deliver at a higher grade than they had given. To properly understand the peculiar advantages the millers' association has in the matter of grading, it must be known that it does not accept the regular Minneapolis inspection as its own grade, but employs a private inspector, whose duty it is to re-inspect every car of wheat bought by the association. When a train load of wheat arrives in Minneapolis, the regular inspector is followed by the association's inspector, who raises or lowers the grade according to his general instructions. It is claimed that the association inspector is provided with the numbers of the cars, the names of the consignors and the grades at which the wheat was bought in the country. By this means he is able to protect the regular association by maintaining their grades. It is a well known fact that association buyers are allowed better grades than outside buyers. There is a point in connection with Mr. Pillsbury's repeated statement that the grades of his elevators do not hold out here. This is true as to the regular Minneapolis inspection, but it is not true as to the millers' association inspector. Pillsbury & Hulbert do not concern themselves about the regular inspector here, but they keep a sharp eye on the association inspector, and his grades are carefully looked after.

MR. CORSER'S EXPERIENCE.

To prove the assertion of unfair and irregular grading in this market, the experience of Mr. E. S. Corser, of Corser & Co., of this city, is given. Mr. C. owns an elevator at Crookston, and began buying this season in opposition to Pillsbury & Hulbert and the Sterrett Elevator company. His first shipments were received here at his grade, but as soon as the wheat began to move in large quantities he found that his grades were cut down, and finally the difference became so great that he was compelled to close his elevator and quit business. He says that while the elevators here were not crowded, and he could store his wheat in special bins and sell by sample, he was able to get out even on his grades; but when the elevators became crowded, and he was compelled to accept regular warehouse receipts, the grades fell off to the extent above stated. In order to thoroughly test the matter he shipped several cars of wheat to Duluth and several more of the same lot to Minneapolis. At Duluth the wheat graded No. 1 hard, while at Minneapolis it graded No. 2 soft. He says he also lost weights to an alarming extent in this market. Out of some 30,000 bushels shipped here the loss on weights alone was more than 1,000 bushels. His wheat, after being run through an improved Barnard cleaner in his elevator, was docked at the elevators here more than he had docked the farmers in the country. He says his grades at his elevator are no more liberal than those given by Pillsbury & Hulbert, yet they are able to get grades through the millers' association that he could not get by the regular Minneapolis inspection, and the result was he was driven out of the market. Mr. Corser sums up his experience in the following words:

No man can buy wheat, transact an honest business and give the farmers justice and ship to the Minneapolis market with profit. In fact, he cannot do business without a heavy loss.

The statement bears out Mr. Pillsbury's remark, that those buyers who are not buying for the millers' association, and who had taken in large amounts of wheat early in the season on the liberal inspection, would find themselves badly left on the year's business while the regular association buyers would come out all right.

More Light on the Wheat Question.

Pioneer Press.

Glimmerings of light are beginning to appear in the dark places of the question at issue between the farmers, the railroads and the millers' association. The results of careful personal investigation in the region from which some of the bitterest complaint has come reveal a state of affairs that seems to justify the demand for a different system from that now in vogue. It is strange that the truth in these cases should be so hard to get at. Complaints solemnly made, and apparently abundantly substantiated, disappear on a nearer survey like a dissolving view, and the alleged complainant keeps himself diligently secluded from the public view. On the other hand, the announcement is made that all agitation has subsided and that dove-eyed peace has settled permanently down, where a little inquiry shows the feeling of opposition to be bitterer and more deeply seated than ever. It is no easy task to get at the actual state of affairs in such a whirl of conflicting testimony as this. Some of these charges and their appearance after they have been sifted are detailed in to-day's correspondence. But in spite of their indecisive character the fundamental trouble that keeps alive discontent among the farmers is beginning to reveal itself with tolerable clearness. The struggle of the farmer in the Northwest, if begun with the insufficient capital that is the rule, is a hard one. The best seasons, the happiest results from his labors, the most liberal prices for his product that the market will allow, must be his, or failure stares him in the face. The difference of a grade, that meaning the difference of several cents per bushel on his crop, is felt by him not as a mere injustice or hardship; it may mean the difference between hardly won success and ruin. It is not wonderful that he scans with an eager eye the measure of fairness dealt him, and is little inclined to submit with a good grace to anything that has even the appearance of less than his right.

The gist of the charges made from the section last reported touches not the railroads or the rates of transportation so closely as the matter of grades and of prices. It is admitted that Mr. Manvel's dealing has been fair, and that his readiness to offer every facility for getting at the bottom of the difficulty and removing it, if possible, is real and hearty. But the farmer evidently does not believe that it lies in the single power of a railroad to give him what he wants. He asks an open market, and evidently will never be satisfied with any treatment that he receives while his industry is in the power of a monopoly, even though it be a monopoly which is beneficent and helpful in its ultimate effects. Some of the charges, formulated with every indication of genuineness, are enough to account for the outcry that has been raised. Especially, if it be true that the local grades are varied according to the state of the market and the amount of the wheat supply, there is a grievance which it would be folly to endure in silence. The reports to this effect are straightforward, and the instance given where hard Fife seed wheat was taken to an elevator for experiment and graded No. 2 shows that there is the appearance of something wrong beyond occasional errors of judgment on the part of local inspectors. It is plain enough that the buyers have it pretty much their own way in the Red River Vally, and that there is thus put in their hands a power which is dangerous enough. It may not be abused, but at least the possibility of abuse is always present; and as we have said before, when this is the case it is idle to expect harmony or to imagine that a man will believe that he always receives neither more nor less than exact and even justice.

Under present arrangements it is of course, practically impossible for the average farmer to sell elsewhere than at the local elevator, however liberal may be the theoretical provision made for enabling him to secure the advantage of access to outside markets. The pooling of elevators hinted at gives the key to this part of the question. If, in addition to this, he has reason to believe that grades are tampered with and that the market supply has something to do with determining not only the general price of grain, but the particular quality which is to be assigned to his crop, there will be no cessation of agitation until some remedy is applied. As far as investigation has gone, most men seem to be convinced that competition is what they need. Whether this be the whole truth or not, it is certain that no complaints similar to these made public are heard from the territory where there is a market open and free to all. The questions raised by a correspondent from Milbank are questions to be settled by the legislature, whose power to regulate commerce within the limits of a State or Territory is understood. The material is accumulating for the formation of an intelligent opinion among farmers on these grave subjects so nearly affecting them; an opinion which should govern them in the selection of men to represent them in the body whose duty it will become to take cognizance of this important question.

U. S. LAND OFFICE,
Crookston, Minn., Jan. 9th, 1884.

Complaint having been entered at this office by Ole Harlson against Hans L. Ethun as to preemption D. S. Contestant further says that long prior to July 13th, 1883, to-wit: June 30th, 1883, contestant first made settlement upon the tract of land embraced in his homestead entry No. 9,374, that between said dates of June 30th, 1883 and July 13th, 1883, contestant made bona fide and valuable improvements on said se¼ Sec. 30, T. 148, R. 40, consisting of five acres of breaking and a dwelling house, that all of said improvements were situated on said sw¼ se¼ of said Sec. 32, and of a value of one hundred dollars, and that upon said 13th day of July, 1883, and for a long time prior thereto contestant was settled upon and in actual occupancy of all of said se¼ Sec. 32, Tp. 148, R. 40, and that said Hans L. Ethun neither on July 13th, 1883, nor for a long time thereafter ever made any settlement or improvement of any kind on said sw¼ se¼ of said Sec. 32, and that at the date of contestant's said homestead entry the said last described tract was not settled upon and cultivated by said party as required by law, the said parties are hereby summoned to appear at this office on the third day of March, A. D. 1884, at 2 o'clock p. m. to furnish testimony concerning said allegation.

'ROUND HOME.

The Morris Bros. are fitting up Guse's old stand and will move in soon.

Mr. Luse, solicitor for Bradstreet's agency is in the city for a few days.

Fred Richter, ex-sheriff of Ramsey Co., was interviewing our city and visiting his old friend, Frank Zarracher on Tuesday.

Mr. M. R. Brown is rejoicing in the arrival of a little Miss who comes to board at his house and call him papa, when she gets old enough to call.

O. L. Rindal, Ole Sorstelie, C. C. Nass, Adolph Anderson and Ole Bjoin, sturdy citizens of the thirteen townships were in the city seeing the sights this week.

Mr. M. P. Darigan, of Black River was in the city this week. M. P. is one of those generous hearted fellows who consider no one too good to have a good time with him.

Messrs. Brown, Walsh, Lamb, Eshelman and others, from Grand Forks were in the city this week on railroad business. Grand Forks is in dead earnest on this matter of a Duluth outlet.

Mr. N. C. Hendricks, who has for some time been employed, as clerk for Fontaine & Anglim has resigned his situation and is going to his farm near St. Hilaire. He intends to stock up in the spring and go to farming.

Mr. A. G. Maxwell, representing Benton, Waldo & Co., took in the firemens' ball on Wednesday evening and made us a pleasant call on Thursday. B., W. & Co., are doing a large business in the Northwest and deserve the success they are meeting with.

Officers of the Dakota Southern R. R. were in the city last week and consulted with a number of our citizens at a meeting held Thursday night as to building into this country. This road connects with the Gould system to the east and would be of great advantage to this country should it come.

Charlie Davis had the misfortune to get a severe fall on Monday morning. He was going down cellar for a scuttle of coal and stepped on a piece of coal which threw him. In attempting to avoid falling on the lamp which he had just sat down he fell headlong into the coal bin striking full on his head and shoulders and rendering him insensible. When he recovered he found that he was unable to rise and his efforts to summon help by shouting failed, and after lying on the coal bin until he become nearly chilled through he finally commenced to amuse himself by throwing lumps of coal up against the floor which attracted attention to him and help was summoned to put him to bed. He was severely hurt but is getting along slowly and will doubtless soon be as good as new.

The railroad meeting was organized by the election of M. R. Brown, chairman and H. E. Cooke, secretary. The officers of the new road, who are J. S. Eshelman, President; P. C. Sletten, Vice President; E. M. Walsh, Secretary and J. R. Clements, Treasurer, were invited to take seats forward. The President requested the Hon. Geo. H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, to state the object of the meeting who complied in a neat little speech clearly outlining the object of the road and showing its feasibility. Judge Reynolds made an exhaustive argument in favor of issuing County bonds to the amount of $200,000 and stated that on that amount of bonds that a man assessed for $2000 would pay a yearly tax of $4 for 4 years and after that only $2. It is proposed to ask the county for $200,000 to be invested in stock the bonds to be put in escrow, together with an equal amount of stock and so remain until the road should be completed, either from Duluth to Grand Forks or from Brainerd to Grand Forks. Stated that the cost of the road would be about $2,000,000. The tax to each farmer would be 108 on each quarter section for the first four years. Mr. Reynolds dwelt at length upon the advantages of a competing line and answered numerous questions that men propounded to him in a clear and forcible manner. Mr. Lyman Loring, of Moorhead was called upon to give his views which he did in a clear and concise manner as in favor of a competing line. He showed what a competing line had done for Fargo and Moorhead and stated that it was just what Polk Co., needed above all things. Said he was pleased at the progress our city and county had made during the past few years and said our progress would be double if we only had a competing road. Mr. Montague gave some telling facts and figures in favor of the new line and considered it perfectly feasible. Mr. Childs would like to see a road built but he wanted this matter of bonding the county so completely hedged about that the county could in no way be the loser—Many others were heard from nearly all in favor of some steps being taken in the matter and upon a rising vote being taken on the proposition to bond there were but two in the hall voting in the negative. The statement was made that Mr. Ericsson had been kindly furnishing the hall for these meetings free of charge and on motion a hearty vote of thanks was tendered Mr. E. On motion adjourned.

Paul C. Sletten was setting up the cigars on his confirmation as receiver.

J. M. Palmer and D. McLennan, of Angus, took in the railroad meeting on Tuesday.

Dr. Barnes returned on Friday and may be found at his office during business hours.

A little son of Nels Johnson died suddenly on Friday night and was buried on Monday last.

Miss Miriam Carruth celebrated her 16th birthday last Saturday. Numbers of her young friends and companions gathered at her residence to join in the festivities of the occasion and numerous and elegant the presents they left behind them with their best wishes.

The firemens ball was a big success, We believe that about 100 tickets were sold and the hall which was gaily festooned was filled to its utmost capacity. Mine host Marin set up a big feast and all felt that the boys deserved a vote of thanks for their efforts to contribute to the enjoyment of their guests.

Mr. Nero Overland died suddenly some time between Sunday evening at 10 and daybreak Monday morning. He has for a long time suffered from Asthma but his condition was not considered to be dangerous and he was apparently enjoying fair health. He was sleeping with two companions that night and so quietly did he die that they knew nothing of it until morning. When they arose he was lying partly upon his face, apparently sound asleep so they did not disturb him until breakfast was ready when upon going up to waken him it was found that he was dead. Blood was oozing from his mouth and nose. He was about 40 years old a bachelor and leaves two brothers, we believe, in this county. Mr. E. K. Overland came up on Tuesday and met the body at Crookston intending to return to Garfield but was prevented by the storm. As soon as possible the body will be taken to Garfield for interment.

NOTICE.

I desire to inform the public, and all my old patrons, that I am still the proprietor of the Crookston Nurseries, and that said nurseries have not been and will not be discontinued; and all statements made or published to the contrary are wholly untrue.

The late firm of Haseltine Bros. was dissolved in June, 1883, and the stock then in the nurseries was divided, and by agreement, and with my consent, E. W. Haseltine was permitted to leave his share of the old company stock remaining on the old nursery grounds to enable him to sell the same, but under the terms of said agreement said E. W. Haseltine must remove all his share of said stock from the Crookston Nurseries by the first day of June, 1884. I further desire to state that it is untrue that all correspondence in reference to the purchase and sale of stock in the old nursery name has been turned over to J. W. Lilly, Esq. The only matters turned over to said J. W. Lilly is the collecting of the bills and claims due to the late firm of Haseltine Bros. I shall continue to keep a full supply of forest trees and seeds for tree claims and the hardier varieties of small fruits such as will grow and bear in this country.

SWEET VIOLET.

When the school trustees of the town of Cornalbin received from New York an application signed "Violet Mathisen," for the position of head teacher of the town school's intermediate department, which had been advertised as vacant, they formerly replied by post that the applicant could appear before the board at a specified time, if she could do so at her own expense. But the trustees wrote, further, that it was only fair to Miss Mathisen to inform her that there were sixty applicants for the position, some of them being well and favorably known at Cornalbin, and that the advertisement had not been published because the board lacked material from which to select, but merely in accordance with one of the by-laws governing the board.

Yet Miss Violet Mathisen went from New York to Cornalbin; and within five minutes of her trembling entrance into the presence of the board, her success was assured. As she had travelled 200 miles to present herself for examination, each one of the five trustees thought it would be simply courteous to ask her a question or two by way of formality, particularly as she looked like a sweet, little thing and thus she was enabled to capture each member in turn. She picked apart Squire Bloker's test problem in the rule of three—and it was a very knotty one—so quickly that the Squire forgot where he was, and admiringly murmured, "well, I'll be darned!" She answered correctly a question or two in chemistry, put by Dr. Pestle, the village apothecary who never forgot the shop on such occasions. She wound the editor of the Sentinel around her finger during a drawn battle over a grammatical puzzle, and when asked by Shoffler, who sold beer and represented the German population whether she knew any language but her own, she repeated a Platt Deutsch couplet that caused Schoffler's eyes to twinkle. The most obdurate member of the board was young Fallis, rector of the fashionable church at Cornalbin; he regarded all witching women, as this creature seemed to be, as emissaries of Satan; so to bring the other trustees to their senses he put a few questions of a serious and personal nature; but when Miss Mathisen changed the cheerful yet appealing look of her large eyes to one of deep solemnity, dropped her curly brown head, crossed her breast and began to repeat Nicene Creed as an answer, the young clergyman caught his breath quickly and removed his glasses as if to get a better view of his unfamiliar character.

Before Miss Mathisen left the room, she had in her possession an appointment as head teacher of the intermediate department; it was in writing, and duly signed by the chairman and secretary of the board. After she had thanked the members for their kindness and assured them that she should be obliged to depend upon them, collectively and individually, for counsel, she departed to look for a boarding place. The members of the board looked at each other sheepishly for a moment, and then Squire Bloker said:

"I shouldn't wonder if we'd find we'd made fools of ourselves."

"Don't mention it," said the druggist, "for I know we have."

"Perhaps," said the clerical member, seizing his hat in some haste, "if the gentlemen will excuse me, I may be able to assist her in finding a Christain home."

The young rector found Miss Mathisen in the ante-room among the other candidates; she had not been there five minutes, but she had already succeeded in becoming acquainted with nearly every one; she had said that she believed that she had succeeded. She could hardly understand why—she would never have came had she imagined there were so many applicants—she hoped none of them would hate her—and so on, until each of the disappointed ones felt it was better to be defeated by this sweet little thing from the city than by any of their life-long acquaintances. And before the young clergyman had an opportunity to broach the subject of a boarding place, one of the unsuccessful competitors for the teachership, but nevertheless a girl smart enough to know that young men would congregate wherever Violet Mathisen might live, had secured the new teacher as an inmate of her own home.

The maiden who thus obtained Miss Mathison as a fellow-lodger found that she had been entirely right in her conjectures, for the little boarding house of which the two were inmates soon had the liveliest parlor in the town. Miss Mathisen's faculty for making acquaintances was simply unequalled; she seemed to have no preferences, she certainly was not forward or in any way indelicate, yet her manner was so full of appeal and trustfulness that every man she met adored her as soon as she spoke to him. She lost one Sunday at church by the non arrival of her trunks, for which she telegraphed as soon as she received her appointment; but when on the second Sunday she entered the church just before service began, the entire congregation surrendered at discretion, for although her cloak and hat were at least fifty degrees too gay for the occasion, according to Cornalbin standards, their fit was perfect, and they were in entire harmony with the figure and face of the wearer.

For a fortnight the whole town was in accord with Miss Mathisen, who had been known almost from the first as "Sweet Violet;" afterward everybody was almost at sword's points about her. Some young men hated all other men who spoke to her, many young women accused her of coaxing their sweethearts away. Whenever Miss Mathisen heard any of these complaints she made haste to disown any intention of knowledge to disturb anybody's peace of mind; she was only a school teacher and a stranger; she was devoted to her work and she had no claim of any kind upon the time and attention of any gentleman in the village.

This explanation satisfied some young women, but when the young men heard of it almost a score of them resolved that "Sweet Violet" should not long remain able to disown all ties [illegible] than that of mere acquaintanceship.

Among these were Rector Fallis, Dr. Pestle and Squire Bloker; the latter was not exactly a young man, but as he was a widower, owned considerable property and no gray hairs, he naturally considered himself quite young enough for the matrimonial market. All three felt that they had some advantage over the general crowd by reason of their official positions, for they could frame proper excuses for calling on Miss Mathisen at almost any hour of the day, and even at the school house, where no one else dared go. Against one another, however, they were rather evenly pitted, and outsiders hardly knew which was the most fortunate—the rector, who could talk with "Sweet Violet" about church and Sunday school work, or Pestle, of whom the young lady purchased stationery, toilet articles and occasional medicines, or the squire, who kept the best stocked general store in the village, and consequently saw Miss Mathisen frequently in the way of business.

The young rector was the first to try conclusions with fate. He made a special call for the purpose and talked of the church having been likened to a bride, because a bride was the most desirable and lovely creature on earth. Miss Mathisen listened demurely and sweetly; she agreed with him entirely, but she dashed his hopes to fragments by going into ecstacies over the theory that the church should be the only bride of the clergy, for did it not demand and deserve their every thought. As she said afterward to the young lady who had found her a boarding place, a clergyman with only a thousand dollars a year should not think of any bride who could not be like the church, self-supporting.

Then came Dr. Pestle, and whenever he came he brought pockets full of bonbons as hints of the sweetness of regard. But somehow Miss Mathisen had managed to learn a great deal at Cornalbin in a very short time, and among the bits of information digested was that the town was so healthy that Dr. Pestle had beed unable, by ten years of close attention to business, to pay off a $3,000 mortgage on his shop.

The Squire was slow, but terribly in earnest. He felt that in appearance he did not compare favorably with his two official rivals, to say nothing of those who participated in the general demonstration. He also felt, whenever he regarded himself in the mirror, that his broad shoulders, bluff face and stubby hair were not what should appear beside the dainty combination of grace, taste, sweetness and delicacy that Miss Mathisen always seemed to be. But the Squire was a man of resources: if he could not hope to capture "Violet" by storm he might by regular approach. He would adopt at first a fatherly manner; he would warn the girl—or woman—against excitable young men who were likely to make love and marriage proposals on no sounder basis than their feelings. If in this way, he could gain her confidence he might become more successful at a later period.

So he made a special call for the purpose, selecting a moonlight evening, because he knew that on such evenings Miss Mathisen received her visitors on the piazza. He was fortunate enough to find the young lady alone; so, being a man of business, he proceeded promptly to develop his plan. Miss Mathisen listened attentively; she was very grateful, she was sure; she had never realized that in a town containing so many pretty women a quiet little creature like herself was likely to attract any special attention, and she still hoped Mr. Bloker might find himself mistaken. But as for this kind thoughtfulness—oh, there could be no mistake about that; it was such a comfort in a giddy world, to meet some one who cared sincerely enough for a friendless woman to warn her against the blunders by which she might suffer. It seemed to her, she said, as if she had new courage to live, now that some one had shown himself so friendly. She was more grateful than she could say; would Mr. Bloker try to understand her if she merely took his hand and said, "I thank you?"

"Certainly—certainly," replied the Squire with manly tenderness; but somehow when he felt a warm hand in his he extended his disengaged arm, drew close to him the trim little figure and said a good deal that led to a marriage within a fortnight.

A happier couple never was known in Cornalbin until one day a commercial traveler, of whom the Squire frequently made purchases, entered the store as Mrs. Bloker passed out; he looked at her so strangely that the Squire proudly asked:

"Do you know that lady?"

"No," said the man; "but I've known two of her husbands!"

The Squire turned white and trembling as he asked:

"Where are they?"

"Divorced—they don't suit her," was the answer, "I'll tell you all about them."

"No, you won't," hissed the Squire; "and if you tell any one else in this town you'll never sell me another bill of goods."

Nevertheless, the story got out in some way, and Mrs. Bloker, to live it down, was obliged to remain affectionate and true to the Squire, which was probably the best thing that could have happened for both of them.

Stray Pen Pokes.

Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is totally unlike some of the orthodox ministry, for while the latter advocate the theory of eternal pain, Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil believes in no pain at all. It is at sword's points with all aches and pains, and its use means their quick and complete extermination every time.

It is a mistake when you do not use Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil and there is a missed ache when you do.

It might be termed "a rainy day" when you have a sp-rain or st-rain. It certainly is a "cold day" when Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil won't cure either.

When David threw his stone at Goliah he made a great hit, knocking the giant flat as a flounder. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil has made just as good or better hits. Rheumatism and neuralgia never stood before it.

Combination in Manitoba.

The Manitoba farmers who are on the warpath filled the hall "to the door," at their meeting in Winnipeg, and expressed themselves in vigorous language and seventeen resolutions. Among other points made was one to the effect that "instead of having a country with a railway attached," we have a railway with a country attached." The tariff was denounced as "unjust and oppressive, and its imposition has aroused an intense feeling of dissatisfaction with our relations to the confederation; it paralyzes agriculture while failing to foster any other industry." The "granting of public land in large tracts to companies or individuals is pernicious, entailing unmeasured condemnation." Grain shipments are exceedingly unsatisfactory and "detrimental to farmers, and to buyers of limited means, inasmuch as only elevators of a costly description are allowed to be erected, by which the trade is thrown into the hands of large capitalists." Other "baneful effects of monopoly" were noted, and it was determined to organize local associations, delegates from these to constitute a joint committee for the whole Province to draw up a declaration of grievances with suggestions for their redress. At an earlier convention in Portage la Prairie, the Canada Pacific Railroad and the millers were handled without gloves, and "graceful" stories sent forth with regard to frozen wheat, for the "purpose of bulling prices," were exposed and denounced. Here also it was decided to imitate the American system of "combination for mutual support." There were similar words and work at Brandon and Morden, and at local meetings to the same purpose. The Toronto Globe explains that under present oppressive conditions the producers, "among other burdens," can realize no more than 6 cents a bushel for wheat that is easily worth 60 net, and that the rural population is rendered "almost desperate" by "pillage and oppresson." "The whole country," it says, "is given over to monopolists, favorites and political parasites."

Miscellaneous Mention.

The intensity of the anti-Chinese feeling in Portland, Oregon, may be inferred from the refusal of the owners of the Centennial block in that city to sell to Chinamen for $8,000 more than any other persons will pay for it, and the refusal also of the Methodist church to lease their property to Chinamen even at $55 a month more than others will pay.

The Gold Coast (Africa) Times of September 14 says: "On the 1st or 2d day of this month the sun was described as being blue in the morning. It seems it rose as usual, and that the clouds which passed over it, from their greater rarity or density, gave it different apparent shades of rose color, pink, and so on. After the passage of the clouds its appearance through the haze was white, like the moon. In fact, an Englishman is said to have taken it for the moon."

On a recent Sunday a barque arrived at St. Andrews Bay, Scotland, flying a flag of distress. A fishing boat put off, and it was discovered that the captain and crew were in a state of semi-starvation, having been reduced for several days to a diet of one biscuit a day per man. But the godly people of St. Andrews are so strongly opposed to anything approaching Sunday trading that provisions were only procured with the greatest difficulty, and for sometime it appeared as though the unfortunate sailors would have done better to remain on board with their one buscuit until Monday.

A few days ago half the town of Marysville, California, gathered to watch the efforts of a youth who was persuading a mule. The young man, says the Appeal kicked the mule's ribs, struck resounding whacks on the mule's hide with a heavy trace and twisted the mule's ears. The mule stood firm. "Twist his tail," "Scratch his heel," "Tickle his hind legs" shouted the bystanders. The driver now seized the bridle and tried with all his might to haul the mule forward into place, but the mule continued firm. While the driver was still tugging at the bridle, Mr. Howser, who understands mules chanced to pass. "Haul the other way," said Mr. Howser. "Why so," asked the driver. "Because its a mule," said Mr. Howser. The driver hauled the other way, and the mule immediately went ahead.

A saloon-keeper of Miamisburg, O., has adopted a new means of attracting custom and is circulating the following card: "To all whom it may concern—know ye that, by the payment of $225, I am permitted to sell intoxicating liquors at any saloon in this city. To the wife who has a drunkard for a husband, or a friend who is unfortunately dissipated, I say emphatically, give me notice in person of such case or cases in which you are interested and all such shall be excluded from my place. Let mothers, fathers, sisters and brothers do likewise and their requests will be kindly regarded. I pay a heavy tax for the privilege of selling liquors, and I want it distinctly understood that I have no desire to sell to drunkards or minors, or to the poor or destitute."

Hot water as a curative agent seems to be having a "boom" now. Hot water internally, externally and eternally is the cry not alone from the Aunt Betsies but from the regular, gilt-edged, full-fledged profession. Dr. G. R. Shepherd says he has used it for six years in cases of inflammation of the throat and tonsils—as a gargle—and he recommends moist heat for inflammations generally, and of mucous membranes in particular. We once heard Dr. Parker remark that there is much truth in the old Thompsonian aphorism that "heat is life and cold is death," and we are glad to know that the common sense views of the founder of the botanical school are being received far and wide.—Foote's Monthly.

Where and by whom was the Mayflower built is the question which has been agitating the minds of a number of Bostonians for some time past, and it is still unanswered. "The Mayflower" seems to have been quite a popular name during the sixteenth century, as several vessels appeared to have registered under it. It is for this reason that the early history of the one particular Mayflower in which Bostonians are interested cannot be traced. There are really olny two things known about the Mayflower which brought over the first Pilgrim company beyond the fact, viz., 1, that she was of 180 tons; 2, that she brought over some of Sienthorp's company to Charleston in 1630. She was not the Mayflower which in 1648 brought over some negro to Barbadoes, for that ship was almost double tonnage, viz., 350 tons.

Winter Feed for Milch Cows.

The increasing demand for milk in our cities and villages, and for gilt edged butter, during the winter season, is leading some of our most intelligent farmers to study more carefully the problem of winter dairying. It costs more to make the butter in winter than in summer, but if a select class of customers in cities, or elsewhere, are willing to pay for the increased cost of producing it fresh in zero weather, then there is no good reason why they should not be gratified. It's feasibility is already established on a small scale, and there seems to be no discernable limit to the demand for a first-class article during the six months when the pastures are barren. The farmer who has the capital, can readily provide a barn that will make his cows nearly as comfortable and healthy in winter as in summer, and shelter all the food they need to keep up a constant flow of rich milk. [illegible] perhaps, all the information necessary to secure the best rations for winter milking, yet we are approximating toward it. [illegible] ensilage [illegible] Some of the parties dealing in gilt edged butter begin to complain of that made from rations consisting largely of ensilage. We shall probably have to put down early-cut hay with the flavor of June grass in it, as an essential part of the winter rations for first class butter. We doubt if the bouquet of the June-made article can be found elsewhere. Another ration will be Indian meal, our great national cereal, which is abundant and cheap, and likely to continue so. Then we want green succulent food with the dry fodder, to sharpen the appetite and help digestion. For this purpose carrots and sugar beets are easily raised, and cheaply stored in barn cellars, or in pits, [illegible] with dry feed, we judge them to be a safe ration in butter making. Cabbages also [illegible] markets, might be grown for this purpose. [illegible] It is probably worth more for human food than for fodder. [illegible]—American Agriculturist.

A DANGEROUS AMBUSCADE.

Discovered Barely in Time—The Most Deceptive and Luring of Modern Evils Graphically Described.

Syracuse Journal.

Something of a sensation was caused in this city yesterday by a rumor that one our of best known citizens was about to publish a statement concerning some unusual experiences during his residence in Syracuse. How the rumor originated it is impossible to say, but a reporter immediatley sought Dr. S. G. Martin, the gentleman in question, and secured the following interview:

"What about this rumor, Doctor, that you are going to make a public statement of some important matters?"

"Just about the same as you will find in all rumors—some truth; some fiction. I had contemplated making a publication of some remarkable episodes that have occurred in my life, but have not completed it as yet."

"What is the nature of it, may I enquire?"

"Why, the fact that I am a human being instead of a spirit. I have passed through one of the most wonderful ordeals that perhaps ever occurred to any man. The first intimation I had of it was several years ago, when I began to feel chilly at night and restless after retiring. Occasionally this would be varied by a soreness of the muscles and cramps in my arms and legs. I thought, as most people would think, that it was only a cold and so paid as little attention to it as possible. Shortly after this I noticed a peculiar catarrhal trouble and my throat also became inflamed. As if this were not variety enough I felt sharp pains in my chest, and a constant tendency to headache."

"Why didn't you take the matter in hand and check it right where it was?"

"Why doesn't everybody do so? Simply because they think it is only some trifling and passing disorder. These troubles did not come all at once and I thought it unmanly to heed them. I have found, though, that every physical neglect must be paid for and with large interest. Men cannot draw drafts on their constitution without honoring them sometime. These minor symptoms I have described, grew until they were giants of agony. I became more nervous; had a strange fluttering of the heart, an inability to draw a long breath and an occasional numbness that was terribly suggestive of paralysis. How I could have been so blind as not to understand what this meant I cannot imagine."

"And did you do nothing?"

"Yes, I traveled. In the spring of 1879 I went to Kansas and Colorado, and while in Denver, I was attacked with a mysterious hemorrhage of the urinary organs and lost twenty pounds of flesh in three weeks. One day after my return I was taken with a terrible chill and at once advanced to a very severe attack of pneumonia. My left lung soon entirely filled with water and my legs and body became twice their natural size. I was obliged to sit upright in bed for several weeks in the midst of the severest agony, with my arms over my head, and in constant fear of suffocation."

"And did you still make no attempt to save yourself?"

"Yes, I made frantic efforts. I tried every thing that seemed to offer the least prospect of relief. I called a council of doctors and had them make an exhaustive chemical and microscopical examination of my condition. Five of the best physicians of Syracuse and several from another city said I must die!

It seemed as though their assertion was true for my feet became cold, my mouth parched, my eyes wore a fixed glassy stare, my body was covered with a cold, clammy death sweat, and I read my fate in the anxious expressions of my family and friends."

"But the finale?"

"Came at last. My wife, aroused to desperation, began to administer a remedy upon her own responsibility, and while I grew better very slowly, I gained ground surely, until, in brief, I have no trace of the terrible Bright's disease from which I was dying, and am a perfectly well man. This may sound like a romance, but it is true, and my life, health and what I am are due to Warner's Safe Cure, which I wish was known to and used by the thousands who, I believe, are suffering this minute as I was originally. Does not such an experience as this justify me in making a public statement?"

"It certainly does. But then Bright's disease is not a common complaint doctor."

"Not common! On the contrary it is one of the most common. The trouble is, few people know they have it. It has so few marked symptoms until its final stages that a person may have it for years, each year getting more and more in its power and not suspect it. It is quite natural I should feel enthusiastic over this remedy while my wife is even more so than I am. She knows of its being used with surprising results by many ladies for their own peculiar ailments, over which it has singular power."

The statement drawn out by the above interview is amply confirmed by very many of our most prominent citizens, among them being Judge Reigel, and Col. James S. Goodrich, of the Times, while Gen. Dwight H. Bruce and Rev. Prof. W. P. Coddington, D. D., give the remedy their heartiest endorsement. In this age of wonders, surprising things are quite common but an experience so unusual as that of Dr. Martin's and occurring here in our midst, may well cause comment and teach a lesson. It shows the necessity of guarding the slightest approach of physical disorder and by the means which has been proven the most reliable and efficient. It shows the depth to which one can sink and yet be rescued and it proves that few people need suffer if these truths are observed.

An Agricultural Creed.

The following is the creed adopted by a recent agricultural convention in Canada:

We believe in small farms and thorough cultivation; we believe that the soil lives to eat, as well as the owner, and ought, therefore, to be well manured; we believe in going to the bottom of things, and, therefore, deep plowing, and enough of it—all the better if it be a subsoil plow; we believe in large crops which leave the land better than they found it, making both the farm and the farmer rich at once; we believe that every farm should own a good farmer; we believe that the fertilizer of any soil is a spirit of industry, enterprise, intelligence—without these, lime and gypsum and guano would be of little use; we believe in good fences, good farm houses, good orchards, and good children enough to gather the fruit; we believe in a clean kitchen, a neat wife in it, a clean cupboard, a clean dairy, and a clean conscience; we believe to ask a man's advice is not stooping, but of much benefit; we believe that to keep a place for everything and everything in its place saves many a step, and is pretty sure to lead to good tools and to keeping them in order; we believe that kindness to stock, like good shelter, is saving of fodder; we believe that it is a good thing to keep an eye on experiments, and note all, good and bad; we believe that it is a good rule to sell grain when it is ready; we believe in producing the best butter and cheese, and marketing it when ready.

FOR LADIES.
I have been using for a month or two in my household, Swift's Specific (S. S. S.), the greater portion of it having been consumed by the female portion of my family, and with the happiest results. It acted like a charm on my wife, who had been in bad health for a long time, and for whom I had paid hundreds of dollars for doctors and medicines. It began to build her up from the first dose. Another female member of my family took it with equally satisfactory results. It is certainly the best tonic for delicate ladies that I have ever used, and I have filled them all. I have no doubt that want of exercise, close confinement in poorly ventilated houses, sewer gas poison and malarial poison often produce sickness among our wives, daughters and sisters, and I believe Swift's Specific is the remedy for all this sort of blood poisoning.

Memoirs of the Princess Alice.

The recently published "Memoirs of the Grand Duchess" include many letters written by and to the late Princess Alice, daughter of Queen Victoria who married Grand Duke Louis of Hesse. The letters of the princess reveal her in a very amiable light. In one to her mother she quotes from Shakespeare the words, "Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown," and adds: "I thank God my husband has none. Every day I thank the Almighty for our peaceful, homelike life, in a sphere where we can do so much good to our fellow mortals without having to mix in those hateful politics." Other epistles to the queen are couched in the tenderest and most unaffected terms, showing that between the royal mother, sovereign of one of the mightiest nations on earth, and her daughter, there was an affection as pure and simple as that which glorifies and makes blessed the humblest home. The letters written soon after the death of Princess Alice's father, Prince Albert, are especially touching. Here are extracts from some of them:

July 24—You tell me I am to write to you of only our happiness. You will understand the feeling which made me silent on this point to my own dear widowed mother; but you are unselfish and I full of love, and can picture my happiness, although I never would have been the first to tell you how great it is for it must make you feel the sad contrast between your past and present life the more keenly. When I tell you I love my husband that is scarcely enough, it is a love and esteem which increases daily, hourly, which he, too, shows me by all possible considerations, and in such a tender, fond manner. What was life before compared to what it is now? It is such a sacred feeling of peace to be at his side, his wife; it is such a feeling of security, and both of us when we are together, have our own world, which nothing can effect or disturb. My lot is really a blessed one—but what have I done to deserve this warm and fervent love, which my darling, adored Louis shows me? I admire his good and noble heart more than I can say. You know how much he loves me, and he will be a good son to you.

I was again so sad yesterday, and had such a longing for a look or word from dear papa, I could not bear it any longer. And yet how much harder it is for you; but you know, dear mamma, he is watching over you, and is waiting for you. The thought of the future is the one relieving, encouraging point of all. "They who sow in tears shall reap in joy." And your joy, dear mamma shall be great hereafter if you continue to follow that shining example.* * How much I shall have to tell you when we meet again, my own dear mother. I am so fond of you. You know although my love and attachment is quiet it is deep and true. If I could give up part of my present happiness to restore you some of yours I would do it with all my heart; but God's will be done. That God may support my dear mother is the hourly prayer of her loving and sympathizing child,

Here is one giving a glimpse of the princess's own happy married life.

Another consolatory letter contains these words of endearment and sympathy:

March 11.—My own dear, dear mamma, these words are intended for the 16th of this month. It was the first severe trial in our life, when you allowed me to be with you. * * The mutual sympathy of our hearts alone can tell one another how tender my love and gratitude toward you is, and how keenly I feel with you and for you every new trial and every new experience.

The princess died as she had lived—devoted to others. She watched by the bedsides of her sick children as one after another they passed away, and thus contracted the same disease, which proved speedily fatal, ending a young life peculiarly rich in sweet and gentle graces.

Notes of Nonsense.

Tennyson can make a worthless piece of paper worth $100 by writing a few words on it. This is genius. Rothschild can make just as worthless a piece worth $50,000 by writing his name on it. This is capital. A young writer can take a worthless piece of paper to an editor and ask him $25 for it. This is innocence.—Waterbury American.

Antiquarian lore: Mrs. Croesus—"What is the price of that clock in the Louis XV. style?" Antiquarian—"Excuse me, but that is in the style of Louis XVI." Mrs. Croesus—"Oh, that's of no consequence. What is one Louis more or less, to us?"—Harper's Weekly.

"Your cheek is an awful temptation to me," he exclaimed, as he looked admiringly at her fresh, young face. "Your cheek must be an awful burden to you," she replied, glancing at him suspiciously.

When Clara was asked what she would do if a nice young gentleman should ask her hand in marriage, she naively replied, "I don't think I'd no."—Boston Transcript.

Cheeky Passenger—"Any fear of my disturbing the magnetic currents, captain, by goin' near the compass?" Captain—"Oh no, sir. Brass has no effect on it whatever, sir."—London Punch.

Poor George: Mrs. Brown—"Why, I thought Washington was dead." Mr. B.—"And so he is; he died before the Centennial." Mrs. B.—"Why, I see here in the paper a heading: 'General Washington Disperses.'"—The Judge.

Emma Abbott said the other day to a Detroit Times reporter that she had among her costumes one elegant dress of hand-embroidered brown velvet and camel's hair, which she could neither get on nor get off without help. "My maid," she said, "assists me, and buttons the two rows of buttons with a shoe-hook. Then I feel just as if I were a trussed mummy. I tell you, though, it fits divinely."

Knelling the Old Year.

From a New York Special.

The close of the year witnessed a remarkable scene in lower Broadway. At midnight fifty thousand people surged around Old Trinity church to hear the chimes ring in the new year. All the street cars near the church, for a distance of several blocks, were packed with people. The elevated cars came down near midnight jammed full and running over with people. Passengers sat on the car roofs. As the bell commenced to toll the midnight hour the rash assemblage was hushed, and as the last stroke of the deep-toned bell knelled the departing year, a breathless silence reigned for a few seconds, only to be broken by the sweet and plaintive melody of the chimes, which played a regular programme. For the next two or three hours pandemonium reigned supreme. The ringing of bells, the whistling of tugs and ferry boats, the tooting of horns, and the firing of pistols formed a conglomeration of inharmonious discord that lasted until the crowd gradually dispersed.

Only nine of the thirty-eight States have sessions of their legislatures this winter, as follows: Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Ohio, Iowa, Kentucky and Mississippi.

The retirement from the bench of the United States Circuit Court of men like Judge Dillon and Judge McCrary means that if the Government wants to have first-class men in those places it must pay them at least a fifth or sixth as much as they can command for their services as private counsel.

Texas comprises 228 organized counties and territory enough to form 100 more without violating the constitution, which fixes the minimum at thirty square miles. There is one country 400 miles in length. A gentleman who has spent several years in the state says that the 175,597,840 acres are susceptible of a high state of cultivation.

Gen. Rosecrans, Chairman of the House Military committee, is in favor of arming the militia with the most approved breech-loading arms. He regards this as especially important in Washington, where the militia are, in his language, "a military posse comitatus," and guard an immense amount of government property.

The president of the London Statistical Society has shown that "in the last hundred years the population of the United States has multiplied itself sixteen times, or, in other words, has doubled itself in each quarter of a century." A corresponding increase for another hundred years will bring our population to 800,000,000. History has no parallel for such wonderful growth.

Three weeks ago a young woman, aged about 25, was arrested in County Limerick, Ireland, on a charge of murdering her own mother. Investigations showed that the two women lived together, and that some quarrel arose between them, which resulted in the accused seizing a hatchet and chopping off her mother's arm. As no assistance was available during the night the injured woman bled to death.

Here is another of the North Carolina stories, this being told by the Franklinton Weekly: "About 2 o'clock on Christmas morning," it says, "a colored man named Bob Terry, passing by a well in the old livery stable lot, fell in. The well is about 40 feet deep. Bob found by actual measurement that the water reached his shoulders. He says that he slept very well, but was rather cold when he awoke. He remained there quietly until morning, after two or three buckets of water had been drawn from the well, afraid to say anything to the one drawing lest he should be killed by the bucket being turned loose."

On New Year's Day, in Japan, there is great emulation among the merchants of sound credit to make the first sale of goods. According to law, all Japanese merchants are required to settle their accounts and pay their debts by the 31st of December, and are not allowed to buy or sell goods until they have done so. If goods are sold on the first of January, the merchandise is piled conspicuously on drays drawn by coolies. The merchant receives the congratulations of his friends, and together they follow the goods to their destination.

A comparison showing the relative extent to which various nations are addicted to the use of tobacco gives the proportion as follows: For England, France and Russia, 5; for Italy, 6; for Cuba, 11; for Austria, 14; for Germany and North America, 15; for Belgium, 24, and for Holland, 28. Mexico, however, even surpasses Holland, for there every one is a smoker. The school children who have done best in their studies are rewarded by being allowed to smoke a cigar as they stand or sit at their lessons. The schoolmaster himself is seldom without a cigar in his mouth. In the law courts all persons enjoy their tobacco freely, and even the accused in a criminal trial is not denied the indulgence.

A New York correspondent of the Boston Gazette discusses at some length the question, Does literature pay? "It does and it dosen't', this letter-writer says. "There have been exceptional cases in which it has, but they are of yesterday rather than of to-day. If one could write two or three successful novels a year, a handsom renumeration would result; but that is impossible, inasmuch as a man would have all he could do to produce one. George William Curtis left book writing for journalism, R. H. Stoddard, a thorough man of letters, has to do other work to support himself; E. C. Stedman took to brokerage long ago; George W. Cable has taken to lecturing, Bret Harte finds employment as one of our consuls abroad; Charles Dudly Warner would be out at elbows if he had to depend on his writings; while Richard Grant White is about the only writer who gets a decent living from his literary efforts."

Scattered the Mourners.

"The ruling passion strong even in death" is sometimes exhibited at some one else's death—as when the "peddler man," at the close of the funeral ceremonies in a house of mourning, stood up and loudly proclaimed the virtues of his patent soap. The out-of-door story given below furnishes another illustration of the "ruling passion strong"—at a funeral.

Said an ex-army officer to a Washington correspondent the other day, "The ease with which a dancing bear drew the colored audience from the Republican orator the other day over in Maryland, puts me in mind of a similar but more effective scene I witnessed in South Carolina in the days of reconstruction.

"As a bureau officer I was looked up to by the colored people for all purposes. I was expected to take the place of 'de marster,' the judge, the doctor and the parson. In the latter capacity I was asked to read the service at the funeral of a child.

"It was my first appearance in the character of parson. I really felt quite [illegible] and solemn as the little procession moved out from the quarters towards the grove where the plantation dead for many a generation had been buried.

"The rude little coffin was borne on the shoulders of the father and the uncle of the dead child. I walked next, with my prayer-book in my hand, and the men women and children followed, the men singing and sighing a 'spiritual' in a sad, solemn minor key.

"The grove was reached, and I was soon reading the beautiful burial service. Happening to look up [illegible] I was astonished to find that the bulk of the congregation was streaming across the open field toward a tall tree, at whose foot a couple of dogs were barking. One by one the mourners were departing. "As I stood there wondering what it all might mean, the sorrowing father turned to me, and remarked, 'Dar dat Mongo has treed annudder coon. He's de best coon dog on de place, sar.' [illegible] The subsequent proceedings were very short."—Boston Herald.

A LEAP-YEAR VISION.

Can I forget that winter night
In eighteen eighty-four,
When Nellie, charming little sprite,
Came tapping at the door?
"Good evening, miss," I blushing said,
For in my heart I knew—
And, knowing, hung my pretty head—
That Nellie came to woo!

She clasped my big red hand, and fell
Adown upon her knees,
And cried: "You know I love you well,
So be my husband, please!"
And then she swore she'd ever be
A tender wife and true—
Ah, what delight it was to me
That Nellie came to woo!

She'd lace my shoes and darn my hose,
And mend my shirts, she said,
And grease my comely Roman nose
Each night on going to bed;
She'd build the fires and fetch the coal,
And split the kindling, too—
Love's perjuries o'erwhelmed her soul
When Nellie come to woo.

And as I, blushing, gave no check,
To her advances rash,
She twined her arms about my neck
And toyed with my moustache;
And then she pleaded for a kiss,
While I—what could I do
But coyly yield me to that bliss
When Nellie came to woo?

I am engaged, and proudly wear
A gorgeous diamond ring,
And I shall wed my lover fair
Some time in gentle spring.
I face my doom without a sigh—
And so, forsooth, would you,
If you but loved as fond as I,
And Nellie came to woo.

—Eugene Field.

AN ODD MISTAKE.

From the London World.

"A document in madness; thoughts and remembrances fitted."—Hamlet, act iv., scene 5.

"Now remember, Lord Grayton," said the doctor solemnly, "all I told you. You are very welcome to come to our ball, though as a rule, we only ask a set of wise men and maidens who know our ways and their ways. Still you are good-looking, humorous and cheery, and if you are sensible you can enjoy yourself and, maybe, do them a world of good. I believe in electricity as a curative agent—not the quack nonsense of belts and chains and musical boxes that only shake nerve centers, but the electricity of animal spirits, the tonic of good health."

"I shall do exactly as I am told," said Lord Grayton, a handsome, florid, muscular young man, strong as a horse, buoyant as a balloon, just back after a self-imposed exile of five years in India with the big game; "but tell me of all those confounded cautions again. I did a lot of dancing of various kinds years ago before I went after the tigers"—and he laughed as mingled memories of Mayfair and the Lotus club swam back to him—"and I've tried both Covroboree and Salonga; but 'pon honor I never danced with a lunatic girl yet."

"Are you quite sure of that?" said the doctor, grimly; "they are to be met with outside of Capswood, I will tell you. However, listen; the rule is simple: be civil and don't contradict. If old Crockton asks you to play chess, play. He's a good player and will beat you fairly if he can; if he can't he'll make a false move and call 'checkmate,' and you must resign. If poor Snobby thinks you are the prince, and 'sirs' you all over the place, and throws out hints about being asked to Sandringham; if you are asked to listen to the chiming clock in Baker's interior, or to avoid some one else, because he's glass and might break, you must do your best to be courteous to them all, and on no account laugh at their fancies."

"Sounds rather jumpy. And the ladies?"

"I'll see to that, and introduce you to the nicest, and tell you what to avoid speaking about; the men will make the talking for themselves the women don't talk much."

"Sign of insanity I suppose. And what am I to talk about?"

"Everyone says one thing—the empress of Austria, or the stage, or white roses, or Mr. Mallack, or black stockings, I'll give you the cue—never fear; only it may happen that one of them will ask you to dance and then you must steal as best you can—talk society or art on chance. My own girls and their friends get on famously with the male patients, and you must do your best. Come, you are going to be our best tonic to-night, and you must be off and dress; 9 sharp, mind, as they all go to bed at midnight."

"Queer thing this," soliloquized Grayton as he completed an elaborate dressing "beginning my first season after five years by dancing with a lot of lunatics. Hope they won't wear straw in their hair; if they do I shall bolt to the Congleton's dance."

He had many strange adventures that evening as he strode about the pretty ball-room at the Capswood private asylum. He was duly defeated at chess by the venerable Crockton, who deliberately slid back a captured queen on the board and performed prodigies of valor with her. He sympathized with the gentleman who [illegible] and noticed the cadaverous man who amused himself by counting the lights on each side of the room and singing softly to himself, "Sorry I can't admit it, sorry I can't admit!" [illegible]

"There's King Lear," whispered the doctor, as a "very foolish, fond old man, fourscore and upwards," passed them muttering of "Brighton's." "You know who he was?" and he whispered a name in Grayton's ear that made the nobleman whistle softly.

"And are there any Ophelias, whose young maid's wits should be as mortal as an old man's life?" asked Grayton, showing that he knew Shakespeare as well as the Doctor.

"Yes, but we keep the secrets. Now go and dance. [illegible] King Lear off for a cup of coffee."

It was a sad, weird sight altogether, and as Grayton watched it, it reminded him of Kaulbach's "Dance of death," and he felt oddly morbid as he drifted to his own lonely life. He had once loved and given his heart to a woman; [illegible] So there were Ophelias here. [illegible] and rested at last on a face.

It was an exquisite oval face, somewhat sad and wistful in expression, of that rare delicate olive color one sees in the south, with the skin of so fine a texture that the red flush springs up through the vein-tracery at a moment's excitement; the large brown eyes were soft and dreamy, the chiseled mouth was half-parted, and the dark brown hair, looking black as night, was worn Greek fashion, close to the head, sweeping in undulating lines past the tiny rose-tipped ears. She was seated on a low sofa, carelessly clasping one knee with both hands. She wore a simple white frock, just mysteriously frilled round the little column of a throat, and a great black-red rose nestled in her breast. One little high arched foot, in peach-colored netted silk, kept swinging to the music. No one seemed to talk to her except the doctor, who smiled pleasantly as he passed and said something to which she answered with a nod.

"Ophelia at last," said Grayton to himself; and in melancholy vein he wished he were Hamlet and could lie at her feet and watch the play.

"Poor Ophelia! divided from herself and her fair judgment!" (the quotation was irresistible). "I wonder what sent her here—some brute of a man, or a soldier-lover killed at Kassassin. Gracious, I hope this Meg Merrilies is not going to ask me to dance!" and he moved away as he saw a wild-eyed woman bearing down upon him, to a seat somewhat nearer the pale girl with the black-red rose.

For a time he watched her; then he tried to magnetize her. At last their eyes met; he stared her full in the face. She never shrank from his look, only a sort of pitying light seemed to glow in her sorrowing eyes. A moment passed and then she rose quietly and with perfect self-possessed grace walked over to him—to his intense astonishment sat down quietly by his side, and said in a soft, musical voice:

"You seem sad to-night; I am sorry."

For a moment he was tongue-tied; then he recollected his instructions and pulled himself together.

"Well, I think I was sad because you were looking sad."

"Was I? I suppose I always do then." Of course being here naturally makes one feel sad. But we won't talk of that," she added quickly. "Do you care for dancing? I'll dance with you if you like."

"Dance! with you?"

"Oh, yes, if you like; many of the others dance, you know."

"How calmly she seems to recognize her sad state!" thought Grayton, as he stood up and passed his arm around poor Ophelia's slender waist, wondering how she would "jig and amble." They were playing the "Dream-Faces," and as they swung in undulating rhythm to the pretty song he thought that a few slips of sanity could come up to her.

"That's right," said the doctor, encouragingly; "set a good example." "Means I'm to be a tonic, I suppose," thought Grayton; so he carried off Ophelia for an ice.

"You dance beautifully," she said "No, you sit down and I'll get you the ice; there now, there's a spoon and a wafer; now you feel comfortable, don't you? Isn't that a lovely valse?"

"Yes. I'm fond of 'dream-faces;' the people one meets in dreams are generally vastly nicer than the real folk. I have many dream friends."

"Have you?" she said looking amused; "tell me of them."

"Well you know, I think I am married to a dream wife—just like Gilberts Princess Toto, you know, with her dream-husband. And she comes to me and scolds me if I've done anything wrong in the day; and sometimes she's very loving and sometimes she's cross and doesn't come near for weeks."

He felt as if he was telling a fairy tale to a child.

"How charming! Do tell me more of her. Is she beautiful? What is she like?"

The fanciful conceit seemed to amuse her, so he went on drawing pretty pictures of an ideal woman; then growing unconsciously eloquent, he burst out: "Ah, if one could only meet her alive, what a wife she would make! A very second self, aiding, sympathizing, helping, loving—at once the cheeriest of chums and the most idolized of idols."

She had flushed a little as he spoke, but she went on, "What a pretty picture! Where did you get your beautiful thoughts about marriage?"

"I suppose my dream-girl taught me."

"Is she pretty?"

Grayton wondered if deliberate barefaced compliment would be good tonic for a lunatic. "Yes beautiful. She has large brown eyes, wonderful hair, a low voice, an olive oval face, she dances superbly, and she wears a black-red rose in her white dress."

Ophelia looked a little frightened.

"Forgive me, I didn't mean to be rude; but she is—really, you are not angry with me?" and he laid his hand gently on her arm.

"O no;" then there was a pause. "Come and let me show you some pictures: I'm something of an artist myself;" and she led him into a long gallery, and talked art so sensibly and sympathetically that here, at all events, he felt there was a very pleasant method in her madness.

"Talking of art" is a recognized method of interchanging sympathies. He was no bad judge of a picture, but he preferred to affect ignorance, and asked the stupidest questions simply for the pleasure of hearing her talk. There was a kind of innocent dignity about her that fascinated him. She was more like a vestal virgin than a Bacchante. So the evening passed all too quickly; [illegible] before the clock struck 11, and before that he was due at Lady Congleton's dance.

"Must you go away?" she said; "Why?"

"Well, you see, I'm one of those much-abused people that the radicals call hereditary legislators, and I am not abolished yet; I must be in our house at 11."

[illegible]

"Good-night," said Ophelia, tenderly. "I should like a little memory of this evening; will you give me that rose? I've been longing for it all the evening."

"Of course I will; why didn't you ask for it before?" [illegible]

one of my best tonics, and this is the first time I have noticed that she never danced once with a patient; that was your fault you know."

"Good gracious! then she—isn't—a—patient herself?"

The doctor laughed till the tears rolled down his jolly face. "Bless my heart, no! That's Lady Mary Pettigrew, daughter of old Lord Polonious, and she's just one of the cleverest girl in the world. I thought you knew her."

"Not I! She came over and spoke to me, and—"

"I see it all—took you for a patient! O this is too lovely!" and the doctor was positively boisterous in his merriment.

Grayton bolted to the house, and having duly recorded his vote against the bill sent up from the commons for chloroforming grouse instead of shooting them, betook himself in a strange state of bewilderment to Lady Congleton's. His hostess welcomed him warmly, like the returned prodigal that he was, and insisted upon introducing him to some one in whom she seemed to have a special interest.

"Really a delightful girl, Lord Grayton, quite after your own heart devoted to art and philanthropy, you know."

Grayton was too full of thought to protest, so submitted meekly. What were girls to him just then? He was thinking over Copswood as his hostess took his arm and they set out on a pilgrimage.

"Ah, there she is! Lady Mary Pettigrew, Lord Grayton. I'm sure you two will get along capitally," and her ladyship was off leaving Grayton staring vaguely at his fasinating lunatic.

Lady Mary could hardly suppress a scream as she turned her head and blushed as deep as the rose he still wore in his button-hole.

"How—how did you get out?" she asked awkwardly.

"I never was in, Lady Mary; the fact is, I'm afraid there has been a little mistake on both sides. I only found out from the doctor as I left that you weren't a—"

She put her feathery fan with warning "Hush" then said, "What brought you there?"

"Curiosity; and you?"

"I often go there and try to do some good. I cheer them sometimes; but to-night! O, how wrong and stupid of me!"

There was a little pause as he looked at her with his frank, kindly eyes.

"Let us forget and forgive, Lady Mary, after all, you were very good to poor Hamlet."

"And you were very nice and kind to foolish Ophelia. Listen! there's the 'Dream Faces' again; let us see if we can dance it in our right minds," she said, as she rose with a nervous smile quivering in the corner of her lips.

And it so happened that in a month they both came to their right minds, and the doctor was at the wedding.

Personalities.

The question has arisen among physicians as to what should be done at the birth of living monstrosities in human form—whether it might not be better to "still the wrongly spun life," but the Medical Record says decisively that "human life in every form should be considered sacred. The physician in his individual capacity has no right to say that any spark of vitality, however feeble or miserable, shall be extinguished either by active means or passive noninterference."

An ingenious western editor makes this heart-thrilling announcement: "We have often written things we knew were good, and thought they might be taken up and 'go the rounds of the press,' and our fame be established; but we look in vain for exchanges to copy them.

There have been various painter Knights, like Reynolds, Lawrence and Sir F. Leighton.

The quiet and ill-informed librarian read the sentence, thought for a moment, and then sent a messenger for the work of a rather obscure author, in which he promptly found the desired passage. Mr. Thurman was delighted and expressed his gratitude by the remark, "When I leave congress Spofford and make my money, I shall buy you."

HOUSE AND FARM.

Cookery.

Candied orange is a delicacy which is easily made: Peel and quarter the oranges; make a syrup in the proportion of one pound of sugar to one pint of water, let it boil until it will harden in water; then take it from the fire and dip the quarters of orange in the syrup; let them drain on a fine sieve, placed over a platter, so that the syrup will not be wasted; let them drain thus until cool, when the sugar will crystalize. These are nice served with the last course of dinner.

Vegetable Pie.—For a small pie, take two or three potatoes, an onion and three hard boiled eggs. Slice the potatoes and onion, season and boil in about a pint of water. When done line a deep pie plate with crust, put in the potatoes, water and all, and slice the eggs over. If the water has boiled away, add more, and season accordingly, as plenty of juice is required. Cover with top crust and bake quickly. This is an old Maryland recipe and is excellent.

Chicken Salad.—For one pound of chicken after it is chopped, use six eggs boiled hard, and separate the yolks and whites. Mash the yolks to a smooth paste, add a half tumbler of melted butter, one tumbler of vinegar, one and one half tablespoonfuls of mustard flour, the same of sugar dissolved in the vinegar, one teaspoonful each of black pepper and salt, and wet the mustard to a paste. Stir all these together. Mix well one-third as much white cabbage or celery as there is of the meat. Add the sauce just before serving.

Oyster and Macaroni.—Brown several slices of bread in the oven, then pound them to crumbs in mortar, and, having thoroughly buttered a baking dish, sprinkle it with the crumbs. Then put in a layer of oysters that had been slightly stewed in milk and butter thickened; put next a layer of macaroni that has been boiled twenty minutes; then succeeding layers of oysters and macaroni to the top of the dish. Sprinkle more crumbs on the top, stew about bits of butter and brown quickly in a hot oven.

"Don't."

"Don't," a little manual of mistakes and improprieties," is a volume lately published by Appleton's and "Affectionately addressed to Womankind." Here are a few paragraphs:

Don't overtrim your gowns or other articles of apparel. The excess in trimmings on women's garments, now so common, is a taste little less than barbaric, and evinces ignorance of the first principles of beauty, which always involve simplicity as a cardical virtue. Apparel piled with furbelows or similar adjuncts, covered with ornaments, and garnished up and down with ribbons, is simply made monstrous thereby, and is not of a nature to please the eyes of gods or men. Leave excesses of all kinds to the vulgar.

Don't use the word dress for your outside garment. This is American English, and, common as it is, has not the sanction of correct speakers or writers. Fortunately, the good old word gown is again coming into vogue; indeed, its use is now considered the sign of high breeding.

Don't submit servilely to fashion. Believe in your own instincts and the looking-glass rather than the dicta of the mantua makers, and modify modes to suit your personal peculiarities. How is it possible for a tall woman and a short woman to wear garments of the same style without one or the other being sacrificed.

Don't cover your fingers with finger rings. A few well chosen rings give elegance and beauty to the hand; a great number disfigure it, while the ostentation of such a display is peculiarly vulgar. And what are we to say when many ringed fingers show a neglect of the wash basin?

Don't be loud of voice in public places. A retiring, modest demeanor may have ceased to be fashionable, but it is as much a charm in woman to-day as it ever was.

Don't brag. The amiability of woman, in view of all they are subjected to from unsympathetic and brutal man, deserves great praise, but sometimes—— Let it not be written!

Don't use terms of endearment when you do not mean them. The word dear in the mouths of women is often nothing more than a feminine way of spelling detestable.

Don't publicly kiss every time you come together or part. Consider the aggravation to men, and the waste—and remember that public displays of affection are in questionable taste.

Don't permit your voice to be high and shrill. Cultivate those low and soft tones which in the judgment of all ages and all countries constitute one of the charms of woman.

Don't read private or family letters so loud that half the people in a railway car or ferry boat are compelled to hear [illegible]

Gapes in Fowls.

In a pamphlet recently published in France on gapes in fowls it is claimed that the disease is caused by the presence in the trachea of the fowls of worms of the genus syngamus. The male and female worms attach themselves to the mucous membrane of the fowl's breathing tubes. The female dies and scatters her eggs by the decomposition of her body. Under favorable conditions these eggs will hatch in from twenty-eight to thirty days. The disease may be communicated by food or drink which has become infested with eggs or embryos, or by the diseased birds which are constantly disseminating the eggs of the parasite. [illegible]

Bees and Honey.

The nectar of saccharine juices drawn from flowers by bees does not enter into the smaller stomach of the bee, where the progress of actual digestion is carried on, but into the larger stomach, which serves as a store-house. The juices undergo a slight change chemically, but it is neither a fermentation nor digestion, and it is not sufficient to destroy the flavor of the flower from which the nectar is drawn, nor to destroy the character of saccharine juice. The change seems to be simply what is necessary to blend the juices thoroughly and to make a homogeneous syrup of them. White clover, buckwheat, the lindens and other flowers impart their characteristic odor to honey drawn from them. Honey contains grape sugar, manna, gum mucilage, wax, pollen, acid and odoriferous substances, and any very great change in such a compound would result in such reactions as would destroy the odors of the flowers from which the nectar is drawn.

New Method of Separating Cream.

From the Breeder's Gazette.

Among many striking inventions and improvements connected with dairy practice in recent years, no one is so striking as the development of apparatus for the separation of cream from milk by centrifugal force. To be able to separate practically all the cream from the milk within a few minutes of the time when it is drawn from the cow—makes it possible to have butter ready for the table within an hour of milking is an astonishing thing. Yet any of the centrifugal cream separators will do this. Differing much in detail of structure, the principle is largely the same in all. The vessel containing the milk is made to revolve with great rapidity. The cream being lighter than the milk, collects at the top and near the center. By simple contrivances in some of the machines, there is a steady stream of milk entering the revolving vessel, the cream and skim milk as steadily flowing out. It is found practicable to extract fully as much of the cream as by any ordinary method—it is claimed even more. At the recent meeting of the Illinois Dairymen's association one of the De Laval separators was shown in operation and attracted much attention. A half-dozen or more have been useful in the western states for a few weeks or months past, and we understand have given complete satisfaction.

The capacity of the machine is about seventy-five gallons per hour. One horse-power is said to be ample. The cost is we believe, $250. There are other machines with greater capacity and at larger cost.

House Plants in Winter.

As the culture of flowers is one of the most simple and harmless of pleasures, it seems to us, to be worthy of encouragement. There can be, to our mind, no surer jurisdiction of a happy home than a flower-decorated window, be it in the mansion of the wealthy, or the homes of the poor. And it is quite likely that those in humble circumstances who have to be content with a few common varieties get as much real enjoyment out of their pets as those who have rare and extensive collections from the greenhouse.

Shoulder Lameness.

From the Breeder's Gazette.

Shoulder lameness of horses is not of nearly so frequent occurrence as is generally imagined; but sometimes the dificulty in ascertaining the real seat of lameness, when situated in the foot, has occasioned many an ignorant smith to refer the complaint to the shoulder; and the poor animal has in consequense been doomed to undergo the painful operations of blistering, firing and roweling. It is of considerable importance, therefore, to be able to distinguish sprains of the shoulders from other ailments. Mistakes will seldom occur if attention be paid to the following symptoms: When a horse is lame in the shoulder he drags his toe along the ground, from inability of the muscles of the shoulder to lift the foot from the ground. If he lifts his foot high, the shoulder cannot be much affected. On walking down hill he catches up the leg with considerable quickness. He will frequently stumble on going up hill, and will make a shorter step with the lame leg than with the other. He goes equally lame on soft or hard ground, which is not the case when the lameness is in the foot. In shoulder lameness there is no difference in the temperature of the two fore feet.

Messengers of the Air.

From the Baltimore Sun

"I have often watched my birds," said Dr. Clegg, yesterday, "coming home. They are up in the air until they look about as big as sparrows. About a quarter of a mile off they set their wings, and with a rush they come to the window, never going a foot past it or evincing the slightest uncertainity as to the locality of their home. I have a hundred pair or so now. All around this neighborhood people are breeding and flying homing pigeons. I use mine often to send messages home to my family. I write the message upon tissue-paper and roll it up until I can stick it in a quill. This I tie to the leg of the bird, between the foot and knee, with yarn. [illegible]"

"How can you tell when the pigeon arrives in a match?" was asked.

"By this electric bell," replied Dr. Clegg, stepping to the mantel and touching a tiny striking apparatus. [illegible] Sometimes I take a whole basketful of young birds up to Havre de Grace for a little afternoon airing. They come back 35 miles under the hour."

"What colors are the best?"

"Well, the white, silver and checkered are about the best colored birds."

"Why will not a common blue rock pigeon do just as well to train in this way?" was the query.

"They lack the intelligence and instinct," was the reply.

THE GERMAN FATHERLAND.

The Reveries of an American, Fresh from the Youthful Northwest, as He Wanders About Historic Towns.

The Germans as Hero-Worshippers, and the Modern Military Expression of this Characteristic.

A Paradise of Honesty and Fair Dealing, Where Even Hackmen Forbear to Take Advantage of the Tenderfoot.

VIENNA, Editorial Correspondence, Dec. 20.—Having spent some two months in Germany, divided successively in unequal periods between Munich, Nuremberg, Bamberg, Leipsic and Dresden, I ought to be qualified—if I am as keen-sighted a traveler as the Englishman whose observations from the window of a sleeping car in a night express train from New York to Boston enabled him to write a thrilling book about America—to tell all about Germany—or, at least, to tell you something new and interesting about it. But I am not going to fall into the common mistake of supposing that what is new and interesting to me in these old places and scenes, the familiar tramping ground of armies of letter-writing and book-making tourists, would be at all likely to be of the slightest interest to any one else. Yet there is this much to be said in defense of a delusion which inspires the callow tourist to deliver himself of his first impressions; that his first impressions, though crude and superficial and likely to be mistaken, have a keenness and vividness which are lost as the sense of novelty wears off with a longer and more familiar acquaintance. I think, perhaps, the average American takes in more of these old countries in a first rapid survey than any other stranger. Not that he is an acuter observer or has a sharper sense of local color; for there is no one to whom everything in a country not his own is so strange and odd as the European. Their armed international antipathies, perpetuated by tradition and policy, have more completely isolated these little states from one another than if they were islanded by interrolling oceans. The same physical and political causes which have so sharply accentuated their national and provincial peculiarities have given them perhaps a keener sense of their respective minor differences than an American can feel, coming from a country where all the dispersed nations have come together again to rebuild the tower of Babel, amid a miraculous confusion of tongues. But if, of all travelers, the American is the most catholic and cosmopolitan, he at least brings with him into these old countries a livelier curiosity and a keener zest for what is old in them; for their old things and old ways; for what I may call the old clothes of the old world; for the memorials of old times which are found not only in ancient buildings and monuments and the like, but in the institutions and customs and characters of the people.

To a green American like myself, at least, from the Altogether New Northwest—fresh as the freshest kind of a daisy—bathed in morning dew from the riotous spring of a civilization just bursting into bud, it feels good to get into countries which have reached their ripe and mellow autumn, and where the atmosphere is hazy with the mists of an antiquity which empurples all the far-off historic background and spreads a softening charm over all the hard realism of the visible life and world about us. But I confess that the old things which have most attraction for me are not always those which are set down in the guide books. Despite the glamour of romantic interest which poetry and song and legend—to say nothing of history—have lent to the picturesque castles and palaces and towns of the middle ages, or to their still more picturesque ruins, my favorite antiquities are not these ancient strongholds of violence, built with the spoils of war and rapine and oppression. Nor do I find them in the royal museums, treasuries and what not, where are displayed the costly gimcracks of long lines of costly princes; the relics of the martial pride and pomp and prowess of chivalry; arms and armor of polished steel for use, and burnished gold for show; swords whose hilts are jeweled with the ravished wealth of dukedoms; and even the bridles and surcingles and saddles and other gear of royal horses studded with a barbaric opulence of precious stones that cost—God only knows what wide waste of human life and substance to furnish forth a knightly pageant. All this nonsense of which the museums are full sets me to thinking that the men who made history, as it is written by the chroniclers, are not the men who made civilization.

THE INTEREST OF THE BY-WAYS.

So I turn from these glittering baubles and the graver monuments of feudal state and power, which recall the times when war was the pastime and human life and substance the sport and spoil of nobles and princes, to ramble—where I am never tired of rambling—in the green old, narrow, crooked streets—the squares and market places, and mysterious courts of these old cities, with their quaint remains of mediæval German architecture. This is found in its best state of preservation in such provincial cities as Nuremberg, Schaffhausen, etc., which have been little invaded by modern progress; but many traces of it still remain in the older parts of such modernized cities as Berlin, Munich and Dresden. The fantastic gables, and the arcaded or projecting fronts are less frequent than the sharp-angled, ox-eyed roofs. The little, low, narrow, dimly-lighted shops, whose antique, iron-barred, duodecimo windows recall the days when a narrow slit like a porthole was the only aperture permitted in the lower stories of houses, which served in part as the citizens' fortresses; while everywhere are the queer courts, inherited from the days when it was dangerous to have doors or windows opening on the streets. A broad, arched and paved passage-way, spacious enough for heavy teams to pass, the entrance to which from the street is barred at night, or when occasion serves, against hostile intrusion, by massive folding doors, leads through the exterior building to an interior area of all shapes and sizes, but usually a spacious quadrangle, surrounded by buildings, the ground floors of which in commercial quarters are still, as centuries ago, occupied wholly or partly by shops, ateliers, restaurants, stables, and the like, while the upper stories, like the upper stories of almost all private buildings in European cities, are used for residence apartments. From the stone-paved passageway stairs ascend to the different stories or residence flats of the exterior buildings. These curious courts—the entrance to which is presided over, at least by night, by a concierge, who, if the belated denizen is not provided with a key, requires a fee for admitting him—form a characteristic feature of nearly all continental street architecture which I have seen, though sometimes modified in more recent structures to suit modern requirements. Farther away from business centers the exterior building only is used for shops, while the interior quadrangle, often very spacious, with a garden in the center, is lined with dwelling houses, though even in exclusively residence quarters these courts are often occupied by workshops. The entrance to most provincial hotels is through these courts, and even when the interior area has been utilized for other purposes, the cold stone-paved passageway has been preserved, on which open, as from a blind alley, the doors into the hotel offices. It must be understood that everybody, speaking generally, in European cities lives in flats, or suites of apartments on the same floor. The upper stories of nearly all commercial buildings are thus occupied. It is owing to this nearly universal custom that so many more people are packed away in, or over, a given ground area than in American cities. Berlin, for example, with 1,200,000 inhabitants, has an area of only twenty-three square miles, about the same as that within the city limits of St. Paul.

PEOPLING THE PAST.

But here I am almost lost among these old courts, and almost forgetting what brought me there. What I was going to say was that it doesn't require a lively fancy to restore the old-fashioned architecture of these streets and alleys and courts, and to people them with the old-fashioned ancestors of their present denizens — the tailors, and tinkers, and weavers, and smiths, and shoemakers, and craftsmen of every guild, and petty tradesmen of all sorts—habited in their old-fashioned costumes and acting over again the unclassical, but by no means unheroic or unpicturesque, drama of the common life they used to live. For it was in these humble homes and workshops where thrift was born of frugal toil and only honesty was honor—and not in the stately halls where force fattened on the spoils of labor, and successful crime was glory—that were generated the controlling forces which have molded the characteristic virtues and what is best in the genius and institutions of the German people. Notably the world owes to these burgher cotemporaries of the feudal lords that organic force of public will and action—springing from a sense of common wrongs and dangers and interests—which first made the people a recognized power in the state and gave birth to that civic freedom which has survived the walls that sheltered it to become the heritage of the civilized world. It seems to me that there are more of the elements of dramatic and picturesque poetry in these old streets, and courts, and market places—in this primitive theater of the low life of the most plastic and picturesque period of European history—here where Hans Sachs sang and where use wooed beauty, amid the grime and sweat of toil, till beauty married use in the immortal works, for example, of that other Nuremberg craftsman, Peter Vischer—than in all the storied exploits of nobles, and knights, and kings.

THEIR HERO WORSHIP.

And yet it is a curious characteristic of the German people that they see only the real and coarse in common life, while they fairly dote on chivalry and its romantic ideals. I suppose it is the old Alemanni in their blood; but, however it is accounted for, the fact is a striking one that their most popular poems and nearly all their dramas and operas turn upon tales of chivalry or legends of the faries and giants and supernal powers of the old German mythology. Their imagination consoles them for the hard and dull realities of their plodding, frugal, methodical life by creating for them a splendid ideal world, peopled with invincible heroes and aerial powers, who help the heroes out of all sorts of desperate situations. I think, perhaps, it is because of this imaginative tenderness for the romantic side of feudal times that the Germans love their dukes and princes almost as dearly as an Englishman loves a lord; not from any sentiment of servile social snobbishness, but because these dukes and princes represent to their imaginations the heroic age of chivalry. These excellent gentlemen have meanwhile neglected no means of fostering a sentiment so politically useful. Munificent patrons, as they have been for centuries of learning and literature and art, literature and art have been thus insidiously subsidized to perpetuate and exalt the traditions and the renown of their feudal and later ancestry. The public squares and parks and the facades and pediments and tympanums of public edifices are everywhere adorned with statues of royal personages. The walls of these edifices are decorated with their portraits and blazoned with frescoes commemorative of their exploits or of the historic events associated with their names. It is impossible that the popular feeling should not be strongly impressed with the continual presence in their visible forms of the heroic traditions which connect the princely houses with the age of chivalry. The world of German art, which owes so much to royal munificence, is dominated by this aristocratic atmosphere. It was not by accident that the great painters of low life and grand subjects were nearly all of the Dutch and Netherland schools, and that the first development of a sympathetic feeling in art for the beauty and poetry of the homely everyday life of burghers and peasants was in the republican Low Countries where the common people were or had been the ruling power of the state. Though there is a strong socialistic element in Germany, it is, I suspect, rather speculative than practical. At any rate it is not visible on the surface in the ordinary conversation of the people so far as I can learn from German speaking Americans or Englishmen who have long lived in Germany. They are, on the contrary, proud of their aristocracy, and so long as their essential personal rights are carefully respected and guarded, have neither a social nor political envy of the superior classes which absorb most of the higher civil and military employments. They have, I think, a greater respect for authority which is associated with inherited superiority of rank, and the German landwehr, for the same reason, prefer to be officered by men of noble birth. Frugal as the German people are—carefully counting the cost of everything—they seem to be cheerfully content to pay roundly for the costly luxury of their royalties and aristocracies, on the condition, however, that the heir of an ancient title conforms to the chivalric ideal, so far as modern conditions will permit. He must be at least a valiant soldier, an expert horseman and swordsman.

THE SUPERB MILITARY.

So it is in entire accord with popular feeling that the army is officered chiefly by dukes and princes and counts, and the scions of noble houses. And fine-looking fellows they are, most of them. I don't know whether they are selected as Frederick William selected his grenadiers, but I have never seen anywhere a class of men uniformly of such superb physique as the military officers who throng the streets of Berlin and Munich. They are, as a rule, tall above the average, well-formed, well-knit, with an athletic wiry spring in their somewhat jaunty gait, which bespeaks a thorough muscular training. Their handsome blue uniforms are of a stylish cut, which admirably sets off their fine shapes, of which they are, it appears, so vain that they even resort to the coquettish devices of pads and corsets to give the required Apollo Belviderian symmetry to their shoulders and waists. The common soldiers are far inferior in stature to their officers; though they, too, are robust, well-knit fellows—as they ought to be in view of the severe course of muscular drill to which they are subjected every day. I was struck with the marked general physical superiority of the German over the French officers and soldiers that I have seen. During the few days I have been in Vienna I have noticed the decided inferiority of the Austrian soldiers here of all ranks to those of Prussia and Bavaria. It seems to me that this simple physical fact goes far to explain Sedan and Sadowa.

That the duello—that barbarous relic of the feudal era—should be held in high esteem in Germany follows, of course. Though the Germans on their practical side are the most peaceable people in the world, it results from their devotion to the ideally heroic that one of their most cherished enthusiasms is for martial prowess. They hate quarrelling, but they love to fight when it is the order of the day. They like soldiers and to be soldiers. This is why the military system of Germany, which exacts years of military service of every able-bodied man in peace as a preparation for instant service in war—a system which would be insupportable in America or England—rests so lightly on the German people. With all its annoyances it falls in with the popular humor. The university duel is an outcrop of this popular feeling. The student who wishes to be anybody must win his social credentials through the ordeal of at least three well-sustained sword combats, in which, however, only the faces, below the eyes, are exposed. These have been so often described that I only refer to them in passing. The ugly gashes received without flinching in these combats are marks of honor greatly esteemed and coveted. I don't know how many students I saw at Berlin and Leipsic whose otherwise fair and handsome young faces were disfigured by these hideous scars—some of them so disfigured that they looked as if they had been tattooed. One passes no end of older faces similarly ornamented. I wondered what the mothers of these beardless boys would think of this brutal nonsense. The German mothers, or most of them, doubtless regard these hideous cicatrices as embellishments—as a much finer and higher kind of beauty than the soft, round cheeks they kissed when they sent the youngsters off to school. Putting these things together, plus Bismarck or Von Moltke, I think we can easily understand Sedan and Sadowa—and may safely venture to predict a similar catastrophe for France when its passionate thirst for revenge shall push it on to a new trial of strength with these curiously peaceable people, who, with all their phlegmatic patience, are still the same old Alemanni of the forests, disguised in modern clothes.

CATHEDRAL THOUGHTS.

Some pages back I had intended to say—what I quite forgot to say in the proper connection—that next to these old streets in which I have been dreamily wandering till I have quite lost my way, I like the venerable cathedrals and churches, which have stood for ages in the heart of these old cities, the mute witnesses of the daily life and secular changes that have gone on around them. Not exactly mute witnesses, either. For they have been centers, not only of the religious devotions, but social intercourse of the people; they have been so much a part of all that has been done and felt and suffered around them and within them that we could almost fancy their old brown walls and pillared arches have throbbed like a human heart with all the tumult of passion and feeling which has flowed through their portals and aisles from every matin to every vesper bell, from generation to generation. What interests me most in those noble piles is not the antique forms of Romanesque or Gothic architecture—grandly impressive as these are—nor the monuments of brass or stone which mock the greatness turned to dust beneath them, nor the sculptured or painted saints and angels, but the ghosts. Baedecker doesn't mention them, and the vergers don't show them, but all the same these old churches are haunted with ghosts—none of your ghastly, thin, sheeted specters of unforgiven crime, but the good, honest ghosts of the old-time people I have been talking of further back—sturdy knights and stout burghers and boors, with their fat wives and chubby children—a vast procession of them moving with the dial shadow of the centuries through the dim religious light of these stately vaulted aisles—kneeling, noble and simple, on the same stone slabs, before the same shrines, and owing allegiance, at least in form and profession, to the same divine law. I have been to-day in one of the oldest of these cathedrals, that of St. Stephen's, in this ancient city of Vienna, where I saw plenty of those same fourteenth century ghosts in the dress of the nineteenth. This cathedral, like some others I have visited, was built before Columbus discovered America or Guttenburg the art of printing. New worlds have risen since its walls were raised, beyond the then unknown seas. Empires and dynasties have risen and fallen around it. Heresies, that all the armies of Alva and the Guises, and the burning and slaughter of millions of heretics could not stamp out, have usurped the altars of the old religion in Northern Europe. Vienna itself has been besieged and occupied by hostile armies. And from the old towers of St. Stephen's went up the fiery signals of distress, when, only some 200 years ago, the beleaguered city was on the point of surrendering to the Turks. Its old walls have never before or since resounded with such grateful acclamations as greeted its deliverer—John Sobieski. But the old weather-beaten cathedral has survived uninjured, except by time, all those perils and changes, and still stands as unchanged as the creed it represents—the type and stronghold of conservatism. The same mediæval people, changed only in costume, still mutter the same prayers before the same altars, still listen to the same ritual, and witness the same ceremonial by priests and bishops clad in the same vestments as four or five centuries ago. There is something exceedingly impressive to me in this steadfast immobility of the Romish church in the midst of all the progressive revolutions of modern times—something very picturesque in the changeless integrity of its forms and creed, and especially in its superstitions. Nothing in the literature of romance is more charmin than its legends of saints and martyrs, which have furnished the chief subjects of the great masterpieces of art of which its churches and monastaries have been despoiled to fill the galleries of Europe. It happened to be the festival of the Holy Mother of God, as was explained to us, on the day we visited the cathedral. All the numerous statues of the Virgin sculptured in relief on the outside walls, and all the numerous pictures of her inside were crowned or wreathed with flowers, and each in turn received the homage of a genuflexion or a prayer from the passing worshippers. But there was one picture of the Holy Mother, guarded by a network of iron, with candles burning before it, which seemed to be the object of special adoration. Crowds of kneeling worshippers of both sexes and all classes were praying with bared heads before it. A well-dressed man, rising from his knees, crowned his devotions by kissing the picture or the torn veil which screened it. Others followed his example. They were the reverently affectionate kisses that one might give his mother. Smile as one may at the superstition, there is something—let us Protestants confess—very tender and touching in this maternal element of the Catholic creed; and its strong hold on the most primitive and universal of human sympathies has, perhaps, been more serviceable to the old church than more orthodox articles of its creed.

THE CAUSES OF THE REFORMATION.

I do not underrate the potency of the influences which have gone out of these grey old piles in impressing some, at least, of the elements of Christian morality on the manners and laws and institutions of Europe in the formative epoch of its civilization. But neither do I forget—how can I in the capital of Austria?—that they were the strongholds of those doctrines of absolutism in church and state which have been the main support of despotism since Charlemagne received the imperial crown from the hands of the successor of St. Peter. This regime, tolerable enough as it turned out to the people of Southern Europe, was ill-suited to the contemplative North German or the allied races farther North. For the German lived in two worlds. He was quite willing to accept and obey authority in the government—so long, at least, as his essential rights were respected. But in his other world—the world of mind—he would have no master. He would at least be sovereign of his own soul. No chains should shackle the freedom of his thoughts. Hence Luther and the Reformation. Not that Luther and his followers had the slightest idea that that they were struggling for intellectual freedom. They thought they were fighting for liberty to believe the Augsburg confession. A great many good people still think they were fighting simply for religious liberty—by which they mean liberty to be Protestants of some Evangelical sect. They understand this thing better in Germany. Limitless audacity in speculation and rigid conservatism in affairs was long ago recognized by Madame De Stael as a distinguishing trait of the German character, and I don't think that, on the whole, the world is any worse for the intellectual freedom which questions everything, resolves or tries to resolve all problems into their fundamental data, and seeks to penetrate even the mysteries of the infinite. These are sacrilegeous thoughts to be suggested by a Catholic cathedral nearly five centuries old. No wonder my orthodox ghosts have vanished with a parting sign of the cross, as if they smelt a diabolical presence in the sacred precincts.

A PARADISE OF HONESTY.

As I approach the land of thieves and beggars, I am strongly reminded by contrast of one thing that has struck me most agreeably in the German people (the remark has so much of my favorite flavor of age about it, that it will, at least, have an archæological interest for you); and that is the robust and wholesome genuineness, the sincerity and simplicity of the German character. They are, far more generally than any other people that I know of, a truth-telling and square-dealing people. This seems to be a universal trait, as prevalent among the lowest classes as the middle or mercantile and professional people. In Munich, an American resident of the city, with whom I was ascending a public flight of stairs into a public building, surprised me by leaving, with his cigar, an expensive cigar-holder, on the windowsill of a landing outside the entrance. I remonstrated:

"You will never see it again," I said.

"You are mistaken," was his reply. "You do not know these German people. You might leave a purse full of gold pieces there and you would find it when you returned."

We spent an hour in the building, and sure enough, on our return there was the cigar and its holder undisturbed. The confidence of my friend in the honesty of the German people of all classes has been justified by such experience as I have had in Bavarian, Prussian and Saxon cities. I have had a good many small dealings with all sorts of people. I was ignorant of the language and of the customs and prices, and an easy prey to any sharper who had wished to impose upon me in a small way. But not in a single instance did any German attempt to cheat or overreach or overcharge me, or any of my party. Even the hackmen and porters and other predatory parasites of the traveling public, who, in every other country I have visited, regard every stranger as their lawful prey, I have found to be as square-dealing as other classes. It is true that a legal tariff regulates their charges. But that is equally the case in London, Paris, Milan, and everywhere else. I don't think I ever rode in a hansom in London that at the end of the journey the driver did not demand more than his legal fare. This was the case in my brief stay at Paris, when the concierge of my hotel had a serious quarrel with a flacre driver on our account. If you engage a hansom in London by the hour the driver will be sure to make the time as long as possible by moving at a funeral pace. These experiences have been repeated in every city I have been in on the continent, except in Germany. I should also except Switzerland, where the carriage business, usually for long journeys, belong to a different category. But though I have employed a good many hacks or droschkes, as they call them in Munich, Berlin, and Dresden, in not a single instance has the driver demanded more than his legal fare. If you engage him by the hour he will drive you just as fast as if you had hired him by the course. If you have not the exact change he will make it for you—a thing unheard of in a hackman outside of Germany. It is the same with porters and others. This prevailing honesty in a class which everywhere is the terror of the traveling public better illustrates the dominence of this trait in the national character than examples from higher strata.

I don't know anywhere where one feels such a sense of absolute security from the accidents of misplaced confidence to which travelers are subject, as in Germany. The other day, just after crossing the Bohemian frontier, we exchanged cars from the German train, which brought us there, to the Austrian one, which was to take us to Prague. While waiting in the custom house one of the guards of the German train came rushing in with a purse which a lady of our party had dropped in the car we had left, then just moving off. That incident might have happened in England or America once in a great while, but it would have been in any case an agreeable surprise. But it was so purely a matter of course with this humble German that he didn't wait even to be thanked. This sense of security which one feels in Germany from any sort of human depredation is a luxury which one learns to appreciate at its full value who has traveled in Italy. I suppose there must be thieves in Germany, such extraordinary pains are taken to lock the doors and gates of all the street entrances after 8 or 9 o'clock at night. But they are not the sort of thieves which abound in some other countries in every regular avocation.

It seems to me that this integrity and veracity of word and deed which the German people exhibit in all the small details of social and commercial intercourse is the outcropping on the surface of a conscientiousness which is fundamental, not only to their moral but to their intellectual character. They deal as squarely with themselves as with their neighbors. They are as loyal to the truth as they see it, wherever its logic may lead them, as to the word they have passed and the engagements they have made. It is not possible to overestimate the value of this ingrained honesty and sincerity of the Germans as an element of the national character. For this is the solid base of all character that is worth anything. But I am not going off into another dissertation.

I am reminded by the multitude of beggars one meets in Vienna (we struck a heap of them at Prague) that I did not see a beggar, barring one or two decrepit old women, during my two months stay in Germany. So far as police regulations are responsible for this happy exemption from the worst nuisance the tourist is called upon to endure in Europe, it is to be regretted that equally efficacious regulations are not put in force in certain places I know of which have not the excuse of being overcrowded Europe.

THE PLAN TO KIDNAP COLERIDGE.

A member of the Irish Republican brotherhood of St. Louis has told a reporter of the Post-Dispatch of that city that the brotherhood had a plan to abduct Lord Coleridge from the Southern hotel when he was in that city. The reporter asked why they wanted to capture the English chief justice. "To hold him as a hostage," was the answer.

"As a hostage for whom and what?"

"Why, for the Irishmen in English prisons."

"To effect their liberation?"

"That's it, exactly."

"What was the plan?"

"We located Lord Coleridge's room. You know there's a wide cornice running along the top of the first story. You can walk all around the hotel on this, if you go at it carefully. Well, four of us took rooms at the hotel, rooms on the first floor, for which we paid $8 a day. We have two carriage drivers in our organization. One of these we utilized for the occasion. Six men stood at or near the ladies' entrance to the hotel, on Walnut street, with our forces arranged in this manner: The plan was for one of us to pass through one of the parlors, get out on the cornice, creep along and enter the window of the lord chief justice's room, and chloroform him. The attempt was to have been made between 2 and 3 o'clock. The night patrol in the hall prevented anything like the accomplishment of our design."

"Did you make any kind of an attempt?"

"Nothing more than closely watching the night patrol for a good opportunity."

"You were otherwise prepared?"

"Oh, indeed, yes. All our men were on hand; the carriage was in waiting."

"How were you to get him out after chloroforming him?"

"Carry him to the elevator and into the carriage, taking the elevator boy with us a block or so to prevent him from giving an alarm."

"Where were you going to take him?"

"To a house we had hired and fitted up in the western part of town. ——— (naming a well-known Irish patriot) is living in it now. He's the only one of us got any good out of our attempt to capture and hold Lord Coleridge. But that's the way of Fenianism, and I'm d—d if I am not pretty well tired of it, on this side of the water at least."

BARNUM'S WILL.

P. T. Barnum seems to consider his life work accomplished, for he has just made his will. In order that there might be no question as to his sanity upon which to ground contests after his death, he had eminent physicans examine him, and secured their attestation that he was of sound mind. The will and its codicils cover more than 700 pages of legal cap, closely written, and dispose of real estate and personal property of the value of $10,000,000 to twenty-seven heirs. The property is in New York, Brooklyn, Bridgeport, Colorado, and several other places. Mr. Barnum values his interest in the Barnum and London Shows at $3,500,000. His bequests for charitable purposes are numerous and large. Among the beneficiaries are the Chapin Home, Children's Aid society, Old Men's and Women's homes, and the Society to Assist Males and Females Over Eighteen Years of Age of this city; the Bridgeport orphan asylum, Bridgeport hospital, and other Bridgeport societies. Mr. Barnum also makes provision for certain worthy charities by bequeating to them a stated percentage of the large annual profits accruing from his share in his shows. To the city of Bridgeport he secures the only water-front not already seized by private corporations, with a dock upon it costing $30,000, for twenty-one years after his death, during which time his executors are forbidden to sell or lease it.

THE SONG OF THE DISTAFF.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon white;
Spin, spin for thine own true knight
The plaited shirt he shall one day wear,
When thou shalt become his bride so fair.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon blue;
Spin, spin, with devotion true
An humble prayer, his priestly vest,
Whose hands shall join you in wedlock blest.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon green;
Spin, spin, with a fervor keen,
The cloth, where scores of us then will throng,
To drink, and to raise the nuptial song.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon gray;
Spin, spin, the broad curtains gay,
For bridal chamber and nuptial bower,
Dear Love's refection, and Virtue's dower.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon of gold;
Spin, spin, with a pride untold,
Weaving small robes with maternal joy,
And swathing-bands for thy first bright boy.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon red;
Spin, spin of the daintiest thread
A kerchief fair, thy tears to keep,
And dry thine eyes when thou fain wouldst weep.

Thy distaff take, of the ribbon black;
Spin, spin, ere thy powers slack,
The winding sheet thou must one day win,
Which one of us here will enwrap thee in.

CHRISTMAS IN BOHEMIA.

A Visit to the Vault Where Lie the Curious Corpses of the Krisbeks—Christmas Eve as Spent—Bohemian Castles.

CASTLE MAROUSSKAU, Special Correspondence, Dec. 25.—A week before Christmas found us at the most delightful of hotels in the Bohemian capital, and here we remained for a week. Words cannot describe the beauty of the city shop windows, with their "specialties of Bohemia" garnet jewelry, and exquisitely colored glass. Gloves made in Prague are certainly the most delicately elastic and perfect-fitting in the world; and more than half the lovely Paris gloves, so sought after by our rosebuds of fashion, are made in Bohemia and sent to the French capital, where they receive the trade mark of French houses. The wonderful Bohemian glass, especially that red, gold-permeated color, is dazzlingly beautiful. The secret of making it is known only in the royal glass works of this city, but none of the operatives, or employes even, know what is mixed with the red coloring matter of the glass to give it its sunny radiance; some say it is molten gold, but the chemist-in-chief is silent, and conjectures pass around him unheeded. Shopping and glass works have not filled all our time. Remembering the lovely drives around Beraun and its neighboring villages, we took the express thither one morning, and ordered a conveyance to take us to the Krisbek family vault. It is a strange sight—that of father, mother, six children and an old nurse, lying upon pine boards in the crypt of their village church; where they were buried in silver coffins nearly a thousand years ago! That is the story. Many hundred years since—but how many even our guide, a priest, could not tell us—all Czecks who would not bow down before a certain usurper were sent into exile. The patriotic Krisbeks, however, rather than leave their native land, took poison. One son, having a lady love who had escaped to England, refused the poison and followed his fiance. What the poison could have been is the riddle of chemists, anatomists and physicians to the present day. The bodies turned into the consistency and color of leather, and there they lie, dressed as in life, in the dimly-lighted chapel vault. You can take their leathery hands in yours; you feel no bones, but just a mass of yielding muscle. One of the bodies is that of a baby only a few months old. It looks like a leather doll, its fat little face upturned as if calmly sleeping, its dimpled hands folded over its heart, and its tiny feet crossed under its short linen dress. The priest who showed us these bodies allowed Sweet Fern to lift the baby; its head fell softly down on her shoulder, and arms and legs became as flexible as those of a living sleeping child. When the rightful Czeckish king was again on the throne, these bodies were put in solid silver coffins, and candles, according to the old Czeckish custom of mourning, were kept burning in the vault, where they lay for many years. The parish becoming reduced to great poverty, the silver sconces that held the candles were melted up and coined, and a few years after, when famine desolated the land, the coffins were taken and melted into coin to buy bread for the poor. About six years ago, so our priestly guide told us, an English gentleman registered at the village as "Crisbeck, rentier aus England," spent many hours talking to the rector of the parish, and carefully examining the bodies. But no results ensued from this conference. Gossip says the Englishman tried to prove relationship with the Krisbeks, but above all things desired them to be respectably buried; but he failed to impress the rector with the idea that such burial would be the proper thing, so there they lie, in their deplorably sad "state," upon table-like biers, while the parish children look down upon them from the iron-latticed windows of the crypt, and the money offered by strangers from other lands, who come to touch and lift the leather-like corpses, is a source of revenue to the poor of the parish.

CHRISTMAS FESTIVITIES.

The day before Christmas we left the hotel, and journeying southward from Prague, reached our present abode under the Marousskau, the hill of silence and rest. The Bohemian is far colder than Austrian winters, but this year the climate is exceedingly mild, so that the snow covered hills we had hoped to see are great bouquets of firs and frosted twigs. Germany, the land of the Cristmas tree, has given its method of celebration to all continental nations. The eve of Christmas is the proper time for the "krisbaum" to be lighted, and although a fast day, it is the vigil of a most joyful festival. Every family has its own "tree," consequently visiting among neighbors on that evening is unknown; guests from other cities, or strangers who have acquaintances in the city may be invited to a Christmas tree party, but it is not an affair of dress, dancing and late supper serving as in England. Here at the castle last evening the tree was placed in the center of the great Rittersaal, used on festivals as the dining hall. A fir tree twelve feet high, with 600 candles, which it took six experienced "lighters" to light, and three valets, with extinguishers on poles, to keep from incendiary danger, is a sight worth seeing, especially when fine spider-like webs of bright gold tinsel thread gleam among the branches and diamond powder glistens on all the boughs. Gifts for the children were placed on the platform which formed the pedestal-like support for the tree, and this platform, covered with light blue flannel spangled with silver stars, was in itself lovely. Small tables grouped near the great fireplaces at either end of the room, and covered with shining silver or gold damask brocade, contained gifts for the guests, such as delicate flower vases, crosses, or bracelets of garnet, music with autograph of composer, and baskets of bisque filled with flowers. Needle-work, paintings or drawings, in short, handwork of any kind done by members of the family, are kept in the family, that is presented to each other. Sweet Fern who has made an exquisite sketch in oils of the Marousskau at sunset, placed it in a bronze frame upon an easel of ebony and bronze which I had ordered for it from Vienna, and covering the picture with dark green cloth upon which were thickly pasted lilies and palm ferns, we placed it behind the baron's chair and persuaded several of the lady guests to group themselves around it so as to hide it from view until our host should be seated.

THE GIVING OF GIFTS.

The children's governess gave the chords of the hymn Adeste, Fideles upon the organ in the library, and instantly every voice in the castle took up the song as they formed into procession, led by the children, and marched toward the Rittersaal, whose doors stood widely opened. With hands joined we encircled the tree and sang the beautiful Latin verses as far as the words "vocate pastores," and then the window was thrown open, and starlight, perhaps as glorious as that seen by the shepherds of Bethlehem over eighteen hundred years ago, formed a background of regal splendor to the brilliantly lighted tree. As the hymn ended, the family chaplain raised his hands in blessing upon all of us bending before him, and then after a moment of silence, "Merrie Christmas" was shouted in every language under the sun. Presents from parents to children, and children to parents were first considered around the platform beneath the tree, kisses and hugs, which would have done credit to a bear, were constantly exchanged, and then the baroness, taking a key from her belt, opened the door of an adjoining room and signaled the servants to go there, where a long table was well filled with gifts for them.

The baron rose from his chair and invited the guests to examine the small tables where their souvenirs were placed, but in the midst of his courtly speech he glanced behind him and caught sight of the flower-decorated easel. He paused, stared, hesitated, approached it. Beside it our grandly gala-clad Lajos stood, and as the baron came near, with courtly reverence this "magnificent Magyar" stepped forward and presented our cards with the easel and flowers. As the baroness hurried toward her husband Lajos again bowed low and presenting her also with our cards, quickly lifted the floral veil, and Marousskau at sunset was displayed. Never were two people more surprised, and never were sincere thanks so charmingly expressed. Sweet Fern was loaded with compliments, and had she been a poor artist, her fortune would have been made then and there. Supper was served in the salon. We sat at the table until midnight, and then after our "good nights" were said, some one awoke again the hymn, "Adeste, Fideles," and the guests went through the wide stone corridors, and some up narrow spiral staircases to tower chambers, singing the dear old time Christmas melody:

"Oh come and let us worship in Bethlehem?" and thus, "Venite Adoremus" heralded the dawn of our Bohemian Christmas tide.

IMPERIA.

ONE OF BRIGHAM'S WIDOWS.

Her Life Among the Mormons, and Defense of Polygamy.

A Salt Lake City correspondent of the Syracuse (N. Y.) Standard relates a visit to Harriet Cook Young, one of Brigham's widows, who lives in "Lion house," one of his residences, taking its name from a statue of a lion crouching over the main entrance. Very soon this lady appeared and invited me to her work-room on the first floor, where she was engaged in making clothes for her grandchildren. She wore a plain dress, and her general appearance was not inviting. Her countenance lighted up somewhat at the mention of her early home, near Utica, N. Y., and of her visit to her friends East during the centennial year. Her brother, Capt. Edward S. Cook, is a prominent politician and farmer, residing at Gilbert's Mills, a few miles east of Fulton. In answer to the question how she came to be one of the Mormons, she answered that when but ten years old she was curious to hear about them, and in after years listened to their speakers and believed in their doctrine. At the age of eighteen she became infatuated after hearing one of their leading apostles, who went East to proselyte, and she, with a few others, resolved to join them. In 1842 she went to Nauvoo, and met with a warm reception from Joseph Smith, he having heard in advance of this particularly bright young lady becoming a convert to the Mormon faith. The following year she became the third (we believe) wife of Brigham Young, who was then the lieutenant of the founder and apostle of the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints. She rehearsed the story of their trials and persecutions while in Nauvoo. Life there was made so unpleasant that they resolved to move further west, and in the spring of 1847 Brigham Young, accompanied by his little band of about 150, started for a place of safety. When within 650 miles of here all trace of a road was at an end. He followed a trapper's trail for 400 miles, and pushed on to the valley of Great Salt lake, where he was soon joined by a company of Saints from Mississippi. The party of 400 now commenced the erection of a fort, inclosing ten acres. Everything, Mrs. Young said, looked forbidding. The whole valley was so barren as to produce little beside a species of bunch grass, while the ground was covered with myriads of crickets, which were food for the resident Indians. Here in this desert wilderness the site of Salt Lake City was surveyed and a town laid out. In the early history of this town, when the need of moisture was seen to be so great, Mrs. Harriet Young was among the first to propose irrigation. She entered into the working plans of the colony with such ability she was commissioned by Brigham Young to lead a party to his possessions in Southern Utah, where also was established a system of irrigation.

When questioned as to her present belief, Mrs. Young said that in no manner had she changed. She believed the Mormon church was founded on the rock. I asked if they believed in the Bible. "Yes," she said, "as far as translated correctly; but we also believe the book of Mormon to be the word of God. Our religion claims the privilege of worshiping God according to the dictates of our conscience, and we allow all men the same privilege. We believe in being honest, true, chaste, and virtuous, and in doing good to all men." At the use of the word "virtuous" she saw a look of incredulousness come over my countenance, and upon this she warmed with the subject and gave a lecture upon sexual purity becoming a Christian mother. She said: "Utah has long enjoyed the reputation of being the most immoral spot in the United States, chiefly through the misrepresentation of newspaper reporters and gossip-mongers, our territory has been regarded by most Christian people as a very hot-bed of lust, a modern Sodom. It is said our bad reputation is so thoroughly established that we are to be disorganized as a community and outlawed to all intents and purposes. Now, whatever of truth there may be in this charge I know can not apply to our people. Probably there is no sect so strict in its laws bearing upon this subject as our own. A wife, even though she be one of twenty with but one husband, as was the case with myself, would rather lose her life than violate her sealed vows to her lord and husband." She had lived here from the first day they had pitched their tents, and she knew whereof she affirmed when she declared there was little or no coming together outside of lawful wedlock among the saints. But she believed it was a common practice among the gentiles, as the very numerous houses of assignation on many streets proved. She had heard it hinted that the territorial legislature was about to enact laws regulating to a certain extent sexual purity. She hoped her people would place themselves on a legal basis in regard to this requisition, and, instead of regarding the illicit amours so commonly practiced throughout the world as trifling affairs, outlaw them so far as possible, even to the death penalty. Particularly let the legislature strike at the political privileges of the people who depart from strict morality in this regard. Let the law be uncompromising and unfailing. She hoped the church and people could show to the world that Mormons appreciate the purity of the sacred tabernacle of humanity not less than the most fastidious. And so on to the end of the chapter.

There is much to admire in the ability and apparent honesty of this fraction of a wife to the late distinguished head of the church. She was frank to admit that the great end of her own life and that of all Mormon wives was to bear children for the church. Her husband was good and kind to her, and she believed this was true of the other nineteen. He left at his death sufficient means for their maintenance and for their half hundred and more fatherless children. I learned that the amount left for her support was $50 per month, in addition to her present home.

THE EDITOR OF THE CENTURY.

A pale, slender young man, with a bundle of books and papers under his arm, lunches occasionally at the Westmoreland, up in Union square. He has black eyes, straight features, and a thoughtful face. When he shakes your hand it is with limp fingers. When he talks it is quietly and in a softly modulated voice. One would take him in a crowd for an overworked amanuensis, or something of that kind. He is Richard Watson Gilder, the poet and editor of the Century Magazine. Under his guidance that periodical has advanced wonderfully, both in circulation and in quality. It goes wholesale in England over and above the widespread demand for it here. Mr. Gilder is one of the very few men I know who are fine writers and skillful managers. No man more deftly weaves a tender sonnet, and none shows greater tact in handling a great periodical. Mr. Gilder succeeded J. G. Holland in the editorial chair, and long before the death of that celebrated writer he did the bulk of the actual work in the office. The Century owes its position at this time to the untiring industry and literary discrimination of the pale, slender young man who crosses Union square nearly every day with his bundle of books and papers.

The Wife of "Mr. Speaker."

"Mrs. Carlisle was present," writes a Philadelphia Press correspondent, "to see her husband assume his new dignities, and sat with several other Kentucky ladies on the front seat of the gallery reserved for members' families, which for several years past has been on the Democratic side. Her initials are the same as her husband's; her full name, Jane Goodson Carlisle. As the daughter of Major Goodson, of Covington, she was one of the belles of Kentucky, and rich enough to marry where the heart inclined. She is an elegant woman, with tall and supple figure, fair and wavy brown hair, blue eyes, and a clear, well-modulated voice. She talks well, and has as much of that indefinable quality called 'presence' as any lady one meets here, and much graciousness with it. She has been a favorite in her own right during the four years her husband has been in congress, and her Wednesday's receptions at the Rigg House, which she has decided not to begin till January, are sure to be among the leading attractions of the winter."

LA FARANDOLE

An Account of the New Ballet by Dubois, Now on the Boards of the Grand Opera at Paris—The Story, the Music and the Actors.

PARIS, Special Correspondence, Dec. 21.—In these days of far-fetched and overwrought plots—when distortion, under the popular name of realism, invades even the ideal realm of the ballet, and galvanism, steam and electricity are made to work the wonders which formerly belonged to elfs, gnomes, fairies and giants—the story of La Farandole comes upon us like a whiff of country air after a long dwelling in the town's poisonous vapors. La Farandole is a ballet by Dubois, recently produced at the Grand Opera house. It is in three acts; and three episodes—Love, Danger, Marriage—have each a whole act in which to display their varied phases. The scene is laid at Arles, in the reign of Louis XV. Vivette is the belle of the faubourg in which she dwells, and the youths vie in their efforts to gain her approval; but she will have none of the lovers her father offers her, and persists in her love of Olivier, the handsomest youth of the village—but alas, the poorest. Surprised by some friends in the act of kissing Vivette, Olivier acknowledges his love for the heiress, and shows the ring she has given him as pledge of her fidelity. Here occurs an amusing bit of pantomime played to perfection by the danseuses. One of them rushes to a show bench and seizes the cloak and hat of Maurias, the father of Vivette. Enveloping her form in the ample folds of the former and crushing the latter upon her pretty peasant's cap, she signs to one of her companions to come forward and show Olivier the proper way in which to ask the heiress' hand. Anything more delicious than this little scene it would be difficult to imagine. While Olivier and Vivette are billing and cooing behind the scenes, an old mendicant makes his appearance, and because of the bad fortunes he has told so many of the villagers, is set upon and cruelly maltreated. Hearing the noise, the lovers rush to his rescue, and, raising him upon his feet, take up a collection for his benefit. Now Maurias makes his appearance, and the young couple are separated; Olivier driven forth with contempt, while poor Vivette is ordered to the house. The old mendicant, however, has seen their harsh treatment, and offers to procure wealth for Olivier if his love is sufficient to merit it. He tells of the treasures buried in the amphitheater of Arles; how at midnight these treasures may be got by the faithful lover who has triumphed over the seductions of the lost souls who guard them; but also warns him that should he prove unfaithful, he will be doomed to union with the soul to whose charm he has yielded.

THE GHOSTLY SCENE.

The second act transports us to the ghostly arena. About the scene, painted with a skill remarkable even in this land of artist decorators, spirits flit in dreamy motion. The stars above tremble with an astonishing realism, and one almost questions his presence in the gay capital, so perfect is the picture of this beautiful scene of the old Provencal town. Olivier and the mendicant appear, and when the old man has left him, Olivier is subjected to the same temptations so well known in the third act of Robert le Diable. Notwithstanding the enticements of the houris, he remains faithful to Vivette till Cigalia, the queen of the spirits, conceives the idea of taking upon herself the form of the peasant maiden; then, indeed, he falls, and yields to his supposed bride the betrothal ring. On the instant a vivid star flashes on the head of every spirit, and the whole amphitheater is agleam with the soft radiance. This is a new feature in the ballet, and is due to a recent discovery in electricity by which each dancer is able to control the lamp fastened to her brow. The scene is really one of ideal beauty, this dance of the spectral lights running in an endless stream from topmost tier to arena plain.

At the third act we are led to the banks of the stream. Day is breaking, and Olivier, in despair at his act of the night, rushes to the riverside to end his grief in suicide. The old mendicant prevents him, and assures him all is not lost. Vivette, convinced that it was only to her semblance that her lover had yielded his ring, readily forgives; and, thanks to abundant tears, the obdurate father is at last brought round and orders the wedding to take place at once. Friends are summoned; the procession is formed, and slowly wends its way toward the cathedral, when, alas, Cigalia starts from the ground, and, showing the ring, claims the groom as her affianced. All seems lost when the mendicant, seizing a farandole (or single-headed drum) from one of the musicians, begins to beat the time of the phantom dance. Insensibly drawn by the sound, Cigalia follows the beggar to the cliff, where, crowning his gratitude by a last act of devotion, he clasps the spirit queen in his arms and with her throws himself from the height.

THE MUSIC.

The scene is Provencal, the tale is Provencal, the characters are Provencal; and yet on all this Monsieur Dubois, the composer, has embroidered a partition essentially northern. Utterly without salient characteristics, the music is equally devoid of melody; and while our taste is never jarred we have some difficulty in criticising so negative a production. Thorough master of the orchestra you feel the composer to be—original thinker you are convinced he is not. The music is good, but it is not so because the writer sees things through a grey medium as his own means of vision; but because half tones are the fashion. The music of the second act leaves the best impression; because the ghostly in the play brings the libretto to the musician; whereas the first and third acts have evidently cried in vain for the musician to come to them. You feel that no exception can be taken to the music, were it in its place; and had the scene been laid in the land of Hans Christian Andersen, or even of the Brothers Grimm, you would probably have found it charming; but in the warm and sunny land of the troubadour it jars.

Mlle. Mauri, the premiere danseuse, to whom is entrusted the part of Vivette, is beyond all praise in her interpretation of the character. Though not so remarkable a dancer as Cornalba at the Eden theater, she far surpasses the latter in charm. She possesses, to a certain extent, that indefinable attraction with which Bonfanti ravished America some fifteen or twenty years since. I recollect speaking with a well-known ballet master once regarding this same Bonfanti, and he said to me: "No one can tell what it is which attracts so in that woman. She is not a great dancer; she is not particularly beautiful; and yet the few things which she does she does with an indefinable charm which is the despair of those who surpass her in every other way." Mauri is a finer dancer than Bonfanti was, but does not possess the peculiar gift of attraction to so great an extent. The French school of dancing is essentially classic; never a suggestion of impurity occurs in a ballet of this character; and to that I think is due its success here and failure with us, where the ballet-goers are supposed at least to be a dissipated class. M. Merante, the male dancer and author of the ballet, is deserving of all credit in both capacities, as well as in the added one of ballet master.

The ballet on Wednesday was preceded by Rossini's two-act opera of Comte Ory. For a long time nothing has been sung with so much spirit as this opera, with its new interpreters—Adele Isaac, Dereims, Dubulle and Melchisidec. Isaac's delicious singing reminded us of the palmy days of Miolan-Carvalho, and Dereims' singing of the wonderful recitatives in the count's part was beyond all praise. This singer has steadily gained in popularity till he has now the position of leading light tenor; and in the florid music of Rossini he is at his best. Isaac has just come to the opera from the Opera comique; and though her voice is rather light for the large room, her artistic skill is more apparent than it was in the smaller one. I have a painful duty to undertake. I have said it was the best singing I have heard for a long time at the Grand opera. I must also add that for the first time I witnessed a genuine breakdown. The palmers' chorus with Dereims' solo were so atrociously out of tune that the house hissed till the singers gave up. Truly, we want Lamoureux back again in the leader's chair.

Not So Bad After All.

Though the past year showed a large increase both in the number of failures and the gross amount of liabilities, a careful examination of the exhibit is not so disheartening as would appear at first sight. The total number of failures in the United States was 10,299, as against 7,635 in 1882. The total liabilities amounted to $175,968,000 as against $93 238,000, and the assets to $90,804,000 as against $47,496,000. The fact, however, that thirty-three of these failures, aggregating $37,000,000 of liabilities, were due to special and distinct causes, reduces the increase in liabilities to 23 per cent. as compared with 1882. The percentage of assets to liabilities was 52 in 1883 against 51 in 1882.

FORTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

Everitt, register, Mitchell, Dak.; David S. Hoffman, register, Lake City, Col. Walter S. Herlburt, receiver of public moneys, Cheyenne. A. G. Lenning, register Dardanelle, Ark; Abram O. HOUSE.—Live stock dealers, through Representative Hatch, submitted to the house a petition asking legislation to protect their interests. The memorialists ask congress to provide means for the extinction of pleura-pneumonia. This they say can only be done by the slaughter of all infected cattle. The estimated expense of such a measure is $1,500,000.

The house did not quite pass a bill, but it laid several bills on the calendar aside to get at the Mississippi river million dollar appropriation, and then talked all around it for the rest of the afternoon without final action. This was the first regular committee day, and the propositions of committees were received by the speaker, eliciting quite a number of reports mostly unfavorable. The dead ducks were filed away on the speaker's table, in legislative parlance, to lie there until called for by Gabriel. The call of committees was followed by the introduction of bills and resolutions for reference.

Wednesday, January 16.

SENATE.—Mr. Hoar called up his bill providing for the electoral vote, being the same as the bill passed by the senate of the Forty-seventh congress. It was again passed without debate.

A bill introduced in the senate to-day by Senator Beck authorizes the establishment of special bonded warehouses for distilled liquors. It provides that whenever a distillery is discontinued permanently or distilling has been suspended for twelve months, and the quantity of distilled spirits held in a distillery warehouse does not exceed 4,000 gallons, the distiller may pay the tax on such spirits or cause them to be removed in bond from the distillery warehouse to a special bonded warehouse.

When the rule forbidding the sale of liquors in the capitol was reached, Mr. Bayard moved to strike out the words "or malt," so as to except malt liquors from exclusion.

Mr. Bayard called for the yeas and nays on adoption of his amendment, but the differences were adjusted without a vote by striking out the words "spirituous and malt," and inserting the word "intoxicating." This word Frye said was as satisfactory to him as was the language of the prohibitory statute of Maine.

HOUSE.—Bills were introduced for the issue of 2 per cent. bonds, their deposit as security for national bank notes and remitting tax on circulation of bank notes when secured by deposits of these bonds; appropriating annually $1,000,000 for the maintenance of the Erie canal; putting jute on the free list; building a ship canal around Niagara Falls. A large number of resolutions were offered calling upon the cabinet officials for information. Debate on the $1,000,000 appropriation bill for the Mississippi was resumed but no final action was taken, though general debate was closed, several amendments made by opponents of the measure voted down and the bill reported to the house.

Thursday, January 17.

SENATE.—The chair laid before the senate a memorial from William Pitt Kellogg, denying all imputations against him contained in recent documents transmitted to the senate.

By Mr. VanWyck, to secure reasonable rates of transportation for the people over railroads aided by the government.

By Messrs. Bayard, Frye, Miller (N. Y.) and Morrell, from various temperance organizations, for a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture or sale of alcoholic liquors as a beverage.

The president sent the following nominations to the senate. Richard Lambert, California, United States consul at San Blas, Mexico. Postmasters—William P. Forsythe, Jefferson, Wis.; Solomon H. Keller, Medford, Wis.; George W. McNulty, Bellevue, Iowa.

HOUSE.—The house settled the Mississippi river bill the first thing after the morning hour by the decisive vote of 215 to 64 for the appropriation, the bill going through without amendment. It appropriates $1,000,000 as a temporary matter, to carry on the work.

The president transmitted a communication from the secretary of war and secretary of the navy setting forth the necessity of another expedition to Smith's sound for the relief of the Greely party, and a special message recommending an immediate appropriation for the purpose. Secretaries Lincoln and Chandler, in their letter to the president, state that the relief board recommend the purchase and fitting out of two steam whalers to leave New York May 1, and reach Upernavik about May 20. A smaller advance ship, which may take greater risks is also suggested.

A part of the day was devoted to business on the house calendar. Very little, however, was accomplished, beyond the recommittal of a bill to amend the patent laws, passing another of minor importance.

Friday, January 18.

SENATE.—A bill prohibiting the importation of opium from China was reported favorably. A message from the president urged immediate action for the relief of the Greely party.

The senate in executive session rejected the Mexican treaty. A motion was made to reconsider the vote, pending which the senate adjourned until Monday.

It is understood that thirty-nine senators voted for the ratification and twenty against, the affirmative vote being one less than the two-thirds necessary to ratification. Before the result was announced, Senator Morgan, who voted for ratification, changed his vote, in order to enter a motion to reconsider, leaving the vote 38 to 21.

The opinion prevails, however, that the action is final.

The senate confirmed the following nominations: Elias Skinner, postmaster, Munson, Iowa; Richard Lambert, California, consul at San Blas; Reuben A Allen, Ohio, Indian agent, Blackfeet agency, Mont.; Commodore Robert W. Shufeldt, Alexander C. Rhind and Thomas Pattison, rear admirals; Chief Engineer Charles H. Loring, chief of the bureau of steam engineering, department.

HOUSE.—A resolution was introduced whose object it was to get at the facts in the Hewitt-West affair. The morning hour was, by a vote of 157 to 78, dispensed with, the house went into committee of the whole on the private calendar, and the bill for the relief of Gen. Fitz John Porter was considered. Messrs. Slocum of New York and Lyman of Massachusetts spoke in favor of and Mr. Steele of Indiana against the bill.

Saturday, January 19.

SENATE.—Not in session.

HOUSE.—The day was occupied in an excited discussion on the Fitz John Porter bill. The second battle of Bull Run was renewed with increased vigor, and a more vigorous engagement is in prospect. Gen. Slocum angered a great many by saying sarcastically that it was utterly absurd for such questions as were involved in the Fitz John Porter case to be considered in the house, and that the majority of those opposed to Gen. Porter did not know a division from a regiment. Among other things, he said Gen. James A. Garfield was responsible for bringing the Fitz John Porter case into congress, and would have favored the pending bill. This attack was warmly returned by the opponents of the bill. The committee rose and the bill will come up again next Friday.

The Homicide at Perham, Minn.

Fergus Falls Special: Constable Stephen Butler arrived here Sunday evening from Perham, having in charge J. C. Sterner, a mason and plasterer by trade, who last evening between 8 and 9 o'clock shot and killed August Mutschler, a saloonkeeper of the village of Perham, Otter Tail county. The circumstances of the homicide are as follows. A move was being made in the village to raise the price of saloon licenses, and Mutschler had made many threats of burning the town if it was done. These threats were brought to the attention of the council, and measures were being taken to put the saloonkeeper under bonds. Sterner was one of the persons who had informed upon Mutschler as to his threats. The latter hearing about this took his man to task about it in a neighboring saloon. Violence and blows were used when Sterner drew a revolver and told his assailant that he would defend himself. The saloonkeeper advanced in the face of the weapon, when the trigger was pulled and the man fell, dying in a few minutes. Sterner immediately gave himself up to Samuel Wallace, who turned him over to Constable Butler, who kept him in his house over night. During the night a mob tried to lynch the man, but Butler's well-known nerve and a brace of pistols saved him, and before daylight officer and prisoner were on their way to Fergus Falls, where the latter is now in jail. Sterner is a sickly man and not the equal of his assailant in physical combat, and his defense of self-protection will be a good plea in the courts. The coroner will hold an inquest to-morrow. The murdered man has a large family living in the village. Sterner had no family, and is a brother-in-law of L. H. Love, editor of the Perham Bulletin.

Making Work Easy.

There is in most families a great deal of hard work at best; and some women have no idea of making their burdens lighter. One of the first things I would say to such women is, have proper utensils. You have no conception of the ease of cooking with proper things if you have got along year after year with anything. We will say that you have had a hard forenoon: there has been everything to do, dinner time is drawing near, and there is still work on hand that a few moments would finish. You have potatoes to boil, shell beans to warm over (left from yesterday's dinner), tomatoes to stew, and pudding to make. You start in a hurry and ransack the pantry to find dishes suitable for all these things. Two or three leaky tins present themselves. At last you find just one whole one. Now see the fix you are in. Time is flying along; the men will soon be in, and have to stand around till dinner is ready, as you can do only one thing at a time; or rather two, for you can boil your potatoes in a kettle. Look at the other picture: You step into your pantry, and from a row of bright tins of all sizes, you select two, suitable for your beans and pudding sauce, and from a shelf near by take a porcelain-lined kettle right for your tomatoes, and in a twinkling your dinner is going on and you can finish your work. I said you could boil your potatoes in a kettle; if you are wise you will not. You can buy tin pans of all sizes, with loose-fitting covers, that are just the neatest and best things to cook in you ever used. No black kettles to lift and wash any more for me! For fifty cents you can buy the three sizes needed in a small family, and for fifteen cents you can buy three more smaller ones without covers. Then you must have a mixing bowl, and pudding dishes of two or three sizes, and if any become broken or worn out, have them replaced immediately. If the good man breaks a hoe or a shovel, does he go without?

Then, finding yourself armed and equipped, commence in season to get your meal. There is nothing that will fret me like getting behind. As fast as one dish is cooked and ready for the table, wash the utensil it was cooked in. When you are cooking—baking more particularly—have a dish-pan in some convenient place half full of warm soapy water, and when you are done with a dish, wash it. Then, when your baking is finished, you will not have a table or sink full of dishes to wash.

A TERRIBLE WRECK.

Over 100 Lives Lost by the Wreck of the Steamer Columbus on the Rock Bound Coast of Massachusetts.

The steamer City of Columbus left Boston at 3 o'clock Thursday afternoon, for Savannah, Ga., carrying eighty passengers and a crew of forty-five. At 3:45 a. m. Friday, at Gay head light, bearing south, the vessel struck on the outside the Devil's bridge buoy, Martha's Vineyard. The wind was blowing a gale west by north. The vessel immediately filled and keeled over, water breaking in an flooding the port-side saloon. All the passengers excepting a few women and children came on deck, nearly all wearing life preservers. All the boats were cleared away but were immediately swamped. A majority of the passengers went overboard. Seven passengers left the vessel on a life raft and about forty more took to the rigging.

The U. S. revenue cutter Dexter came along about 12:30 Friday noon and sent off two boats. Twenty one persons, one of whom was dead, were placed aboard the Dexter, and after all persons had been taken from the vessel, the Dexter proceeded to New Bedford. Three persons died after going aboard the Dexter.

The following are names of the lost:

The following is a full list of the lost:

Four dead bodies of men were brought to New Bedford on the Dexter. One has not been identified. Two have been identified as H. Brooks, Northboro, Mass., G. Fred Chandler, Hyde Park. The other is supposed, from a card found in his pocket, to have been a member of the firm of O. Richardson & Co., Clinton Market, Boston. One passenger lost was N. J. Morton, lately connected with the Boston Globe, who was going South for his health.

The total number of persons saved was twenty-three. Five dead bodies were recovered, and 119 souls are unaccounted for. The ledges on which the City of Columbus struck are considered by mariners one of the most dangerous points on the coast. The ledges consist of a formation of submerged rocks, constituting a double ledge, the outer stratum of which is called "Devils' Back," both ledges being called "Devil's Bridge" The ledges are abreast the Gayhead light on the mainland, and extend a little to southward of it.

The City of Columbus was one of the finest vessels on the coast. She was built in 1878 by John Roach & Son of Chester, Pa. It is said that the steamship was insured at a lower rate than any other vessel on the coast. She was valued at $300 000 and insured for $250 000—$170,000 in English and $80,000 in American companies.

Capt. S. E. Wright is a seaman of experience and excellent reputation. He has been in command of steamers of the Boston and Savannah line since 1869. He commanded the city of Columbus since she was purchased by the line. He never had an accident until last September, when his vessel sunk a bark off Nantucket.

The New Railroad President.

Mr. Villard's successor as president of the Northern Pacific has at last been appointed. The directors of the company met on the 17th at the office in the Mills building, New York. J. Pierrepont Morgan, Frederick Billings, B. P. Cheney, August Belmont and John C. Bullitt, the committee, stated that, after giving the matter the most careful consideration, the committee had unanimously decided to nominate Robert Harris, at present vice president of the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad.

The report was accepted and Harris unanimously elected. Harris thanked the directors for the honor and assumed the duties immediately. It was decided that Vice President Thomas F. Oakes, who had been acting general manager since the resignation of Herman Haupt, should continue in that office. He will leave for St. Paul and take up his residence at that point.

Although for the past six years the general executive officer of the Erie railway, Mr. Harris is really a Western man, and first achieved prominence in the great West. His first important trust was that of superintendent of what is now the Western Union railway of Wisconsin. Later he became superintendent of what was then the Galveston, Houston & Henderson railroad of Texas.

Becoming a resident of Massachusetts at the outbreak of the rebellion, he enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment and served with distinction as a regimental staff officer until the close of the war, when he was called to the assistant superintendency of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad, of which company he became superintendent and afterward president.

Romance and Reality.

Romance and reality are so interwoven in the following story in the Omaha (Neb.) Republican that one is tempted to renew again his faith in the proverb that truth is stranger than fiction: "Among the travlers who arrived on the late train last night were a young man and woman who were on Sunday last made man and wife. The groom is a travelling man, Frank Graham, who represents a Chicago house. His bride is a young lady of nineteen, whose home was at West Lebanon, Ind. The Chicago man was visiting the Hoosie town in a professional capacity when he met his wife under curious circumstances. He was on his way to meet a customer of his house, when he heard an explosion in dwelling along the road. He rushed in, and was just in time to seize some bed-clothing and smother the flames, which were consuming the clothing of a young lady, the sole occupent of the room. After putting out the fire and saving the house from destruction, he called a physician, who did what he could to relieve the sufferings of the young lady. Graham was "struck" and, instead of leaving town the next day, as he had intended, he remained until the lady he had so gallantly rescued was nearly recovered, when, as stated above he married her, and the two started West on a wedding tour. It was a curious fact that on the way to this city a telegram overtook them announcing that the bride's uncle had died and left her $40,000."

MINNESOTA NEWS.

Minnesota State Horticultural Society.

The seventeenth annual meeting of the state horticultural society was held at the agricultural building of the state university at Minneapolis, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday last.

The President, J. S. Harris, was in the chair. Col. Stevens made an address of welcome, to which President Harris responded:

J. H. Stevens, from the committee on the president's address, reported that, following its recommendations, L. B. Hodges, Dr. Jewell, Dr. J. A. Warder, Col. D. A. Robertson, S. M. Ford, T. M. Smith, J. T. Grimes, and A. W. Sias be regarded as honorary life members of the society. After several eulogistic speeches concerning the persons thus proposed to be honored, the report was adopted.

In response, Col. Robertson said, among other things, that you must plant the seed in our own soil before you can produce a hardy fruit. Experiment a little; plant a few seeds from any good variety of apples and await the result; you will not be disappointed. Minnesota will one day be at the head of fruit-growing States; but only from her seedlings.

P. M. Gideon, of the State fruit farm, said that he had planted all kinds of Southern seeds—never less than a bushel of any one kind. In ten years all his trees were dead, or dying.

The treasurer's report showed that the receipts of the year were $2,197.35, expenditures the same, save a balance in the treasury of $172.26. The secretary's report says that the state horticultural society is steadily but too slowly increasing. Some means of canvassing for members should be adopted. If once a member is secured he usually remains in the society.

After a graphic description of the tornado at Rochester last summer, of which he was an eye witness, A. W. Sias, in his paper on tornadoes, said:

The farmer who plants forest trees about his farm shelters not only himself, but is doing something that will benefit the community for all time. Although the inhabitants of populous cities have decreed against it and have forbidden its growth, there is no tree in the whole catalogue of forestry that can compare with the cottonwood in value on our prairies. Hardy, rapid-growing, enduring, it flourishes in our climate and attains enormous size. It is useful as fuel and is valuable for many other purposes. I believe it does more to open the way for the cultivation of fruit trees than any other of our trees. The cottonwood will endure so long as there is fuel and shelter required on the boundless prairies of the northwest. It is the tree which will most surely protect against tornadoes. While other trees were utterly demolished by our terrific storm, medium-sized cottonwoods withstood the blast with only the loss of a few limbs.

At the close of the paper President Harris added a word of testimony as to the value of cottonwood as a production against tornadoes.

The entries of fruits and vegetables comprise about every variety of apple raised in Minnesota, with some very fine vegetables. A few paintings were also on exhibition.

Alvin S. Bennett of Weyauwega, Wis., shows specimens of wood and burrs of chestnut trees twenty-five years old growing in Waupaca county, Wis., above latitude 44. There are ten trees, perfectly sound, grown from seed raised in Grafton, Mass. These trees endured a temperature of 40 deg. below zero last winter.

Col. Robertson of St. Paul in discussing the paper of A. W. Sias on "Tornadoes," endorsed what that gentleman said about the cottonwood. The tree is a poplar—so named in Italy—poplar it is called because it is so popular. The cottonwood will grow anywhere; on our prairies, in swamps, on hillsides.

On Wednesday, interesting papers were read, on "Native Plums" by G. M. Loard of Excelsior, in which the De Soto was said to be the best variety. Supt. Gideon, of the state fruit farm, stated that plums had been raised in the vicinity of Osakis that were about the size of hen's eggs. A paper on Blight on Fruit trees led to a long discussion. The best remedy in the reader's opinion, is an application of lime, supplied to the trunks in the form of whitewash. He believed trees could be imported from the steppes of Russia which would not be affected by this curse. Mr. Pearce of Minneapolis read a short paper on the same subject in which he took the ground that by proper mulching the plague could be stayed.

Speaking of applications to prevent the disease, Mr. Smith told of a case where an open fruit can of kerosene hung upon the limbs of trees had kept it away, other trees in the neighborhood being killed. Mr. Mendenhall, the entomologist of Minneapolis, read a report in which he mentioned the various methods of destroying the armies of insects that prey upon trees, etc.

Secretary Gibbs presented the medal of the American Pomological association for the collection of apples and grapes at the Philadelphia exposition. The medal is a handsome silver one, enclosed in a plush leather case; its diameter is about two and a half inches.

"Does it Pay to Fool with Apples in Minnesota, a paper by Sidney Carp" was read by the assistant secretary. The querulous title of the paper was answered in the negative, though the writer strongly urged the importance of apple raising in Minnesota, his profits on a small orchard being at the rate of $600 per acre.

The report on the Waupaca Seedling Apples, by William A. Springer of Fremont, Wis., was presented by the secretary. The most successful variety of these seedlings is the Wolf River, in the past dozen years they having never failed to bear. The report described several orchards in Waupaca county, naming the best and most productive varieties.

M. Pearce of Minneapolis thought the quality of the Wolf River not quite equal to that of the Wealthy, of this State, though it was hardier.

Mr. J. C. Plumb of Milton, Wis., read a paper on "Adaptation in Fruit growing;" in which he said: "To Russian pareurage must we look for successful varieties of apples, suited to our uses. In well drained soil, not too rich, on northern slopes and airy hill tops must our trees be planted; and with a better understanding of the causes of blight, we can make fruit growing a most profitable industry in the northwest.

An interesting report on Plums, Cherries and Apples tested in Carver county, was read by the secretary, after which, the author, Charles Luedloff, the most extensive fruit grower in the state outside of professional nurserymen, was introduced to the society, and made a few remarks, especially urging the importance of inducing the young people to join the local and state horticultural societies.

The election of officers resulted as follows:

G. W. Fuller was appointed delegate to the Iowa Horticultural society for next year, and A. W. Sias delegate to the Wisconsin horticultural meeting in February.

The resignations have n been accepted.

Harvard in a Fever Heat.

From The Boston Advertiser.

Harvard is at fever heat. Two circumstances combine to cause deep indignation in the student breast and a large amount of free conversation in the student atmosphere. It is true that the two causes are dissimilar, but the respective classes or students affected are equally wrought up by them. The first cause relates to football and the second to ink. The football grievance is, of course, the result of sudden anxiety on the part of the athletic committee of the faculty, to save the members of the eleven from being bitten and pounded b the 210—pound freshman in the Yal rush-line. Not that the members of th Harvard team have any strong individual yearning for death, but that, collectively, they dread the cry that will go up from Yale, that Harvard has "crawled." The decision of the athletic committee is a wise and humane one, and is a stinging rebuke to naughty Yale.

As for the other cause of exitement, it relates solely to the law school building. The students of law care nothing for football, but they idolize their stylographic pens, which they buy of co-operative society at ninety nine and a half per cent. discount. Under a rule made out of a reverence for the spick and span new edifice, no ink is allowed to be brought into any part of the law school building, unless it is in a patent safety inkstand. Men having stylographic pens do no need inkstands, and they have violated the rule and kept ink in bottles in their private lockers. The present excitement is owing to the charge by owners of ink tha their lockers have been opened by dr plicate keys and their ink confiscate Youth is rash and headstrong, and co thought would doubtless convince t law students that a clean floor is of more consequence than the comfort an convenience of a hundred men.

All the saloons in Lawrence, Kan., have closed permanently.

PILLSBURY PINNED.

Mr. C. A. Pillsbury in the Pioneer Press of the 21st inst, says:

There was a man at Crookston who said he had been docked fourteen pounds to the bushel at our Angus elevator. But he acknowledged at Crookston—a very important thing which seems not to have been stated to your correspondent—that he had made his complaint at Minneapolis, and it had been settled long before the Crookston meeting, and before there was any agitation. But I must say further about this transaction that the agent at Angus had worked for us only about a week when the elevator burned and the wheat with it. It is possible that this wheat should have been docked fourteen pounds. I have seen wheat that ought to be so docked and more too. But as the farmer thought he had been wronged and the wheat was burned and no way of testing it, we took his word and paid his claim. It looks like straining the thing a little to bring this up as a case of injustice.

Mr. J. M. Palmer is the man referred to by Mr. Pillsbury and the following is his reply:

STATE OF MINNESOTA, } ss.
COUNTY OF POLK. }

James M. Palmer being duly sworn says that he is a farmer residing near Angus, said county, that during the season of 1883, he raised a crop of wheat on his farm in Sec. 20, T. 153, R. 47, in the town of Angus, that on or about October 1st, 1883, he delivered eight hundred bushels of wheat to Pillsbury & Hulbert's Elevator at Angus station, which wheat was taken from the threshing machine and delivered to said elevator and was graded by the agent of said elevator No. 2 hard, after docking the same fourteen (14) pounds to the bushel. Affiant further says that the same quality of wheat in the same condition as delivered to said elevator, was by him loaded into a car and shipped to Duluth, Minnesota, where the same was returned to affiant as graded No. 1 hard and only docked one half lb. to the bushel for cleaning. That soon after the delivery of said wheat to said elevator at Angus the said elevator with all the wheat was destroyed by fire. That affiant at the time of said delivery objected to such heavy dockage as 14 pounds to the bushel, but got no satisfaction.

That on the 9th day of January, A. D. 1884 affiant appeared in the City Hall in the city of Crookston, at the meeting then being held there, at which was present A. Manvel, General Manager of the St. P., M. & M. Ry, Charles A. Pillsbury, C. S. Hulbert and others, that affiant then and there publicly stated the facts in regard to said excessive dockage on said wheat delivered to the elevator of Pillsbury & Hulbert at Angus, Minnesota. Affiant further says that his attention has been called to a letter over the signature of Charles A. Pillsbury, dated Minneapolis, January 19th, and appearing in the daily Pioneer Press for Monday, January 21st, 1884. That affiant has read said letter, and affiant further says he is the person referred to therein as having been docked 14 pounds to the bushel, and that affiant never acknowledged he had made a complaint in said matter at Minneapolis, and that the same had been settled. Affiant says that said statement in said letter of Mr. Charles A. Pillsbury aforesaid is false and untrue, and that affiant has never been settled with as to dockage. Affiant further says that by reason of the unjust and groundless dockage by the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator at Angus, Minnesota, as aforesaid, affiant has been injured and damaged and defrauded out of about two hundred and thirty-nine dollars, which has never been settled, compromised or paid to him by Pillsbury & Hulbert or any one else, and still remains unpaid, unsettled and uncompromised, and as affiant believes justly due to affiant.

J. M. PALMER.

FARMERS, BUSINESS MEN and LABORERS: One of the first settlers and an old fur-buyer of twenty years ago has a few words to say to his brother wheat-buyers. In the first place I am very sorry that I did not have an introduction to the gentlemen from Minneapolis who held a meeting here a few days ago and been allowed to say a few words in regard to the wheat stealing that is going on in the Valley, as I could throw a little light on the question. The reason I call them "brothers" is because they are doing with the farmers to-day the same as I used to do with the Indians twenty years ago. Farmers, are you no better than the Indians, of whom I bought furs on the same principle as the grain buyers are buying your wheat? Furs that would grade No. 1 in the eastern market I bought for No. 3, and No. 3 for No. 4, these were all mixed up and sold for No. 1 Hard in the eastern markets. These wheat buyers, in order to get away with the stealings, (for stealings I must call it) come to you with specious pleas and tell you if there is any stealing going on it is not an error of heart but simply an error of judgment, i. e. they dont go for to do so on purpose, and then they make a very frank(?) parade of their books of the shipping elevators in this country but they do not make as frank a showing of the books which show their shipments out! Oh, no! Those books would be too ponderous for the average farmer mind to comprehend and really do not concern him! And besides if he should chance to understand them it might reveal the African. They prefer to soft soap the granger and pull the wool over his eyes. They tell you they are losing money handling our wheat but the fact that they make such strenuous efforts to hold their grip gives the lie direct to that assertion.

P. J LACHAPELLE.

Another Farmer's View.

MILBANK, Dak., Jan. 13th.

To the Editor: Permit me to thank you, in behalf of the farmers and business men of the Northwest, for the stand you take on the wheat and transportation question—a question now of more vital importance to the prosperity of the country than any other. Your weekly of the 27th of December was in marked contrast to that of a paper in a neighboring city, claiming to be a farmer's paper, which that week could only find room for two snaps at the grievances of the farming class. I notice Superintendent Manvel says "that he recognizes that the interests of the farmers and the railroad are identical." He must mean this in a Pickwickian sense, for by his own showing he has practically given the control of the wheat business along the line of his road into the hands of Pillsbury & Hulbert, the line elevator men. I am glad the gentlemen representing the wheat and elevator interests let us hear from them, for we want all sides of the question. So far, however, I, for one, cannot see that they have given us any good and valid reason why a few men should control the great staple product of the Northwest, to the detriment of the producing classes. I strongly suspect that if Mr. Pillsbury was compelled to market his flour in one single city, say Milwaukee, and knew at the same time that there was no competition and the market was absolutely controlled by the few buyers there, the wheat and milling business would have fewer attractions. Yet this is precisely the position of every man who raises wheat in the Northwest. The simple truth is that the millers' association and the line elevator men can fix the grade and price of grain, and the merchants and farmers of the country are helpless. I do not propose to discuss the question here as how they do grade, nor the wide margin in prices between the country and the market cities, but to call attention to the injury done to the prosperity of the country, growing out of this condition of affairs. That there is no practical competition in our country wheat markets; that the line elevator men and the millers' association fix both the grade and price of grain as their interests and pleasure dictate; that the difference in price between the country stations and the market cities is much greater than it should be, after allowing for freight, reasonable commission, are facts beyond discussion. Every man, outside of the rings who has given the subject any thought concedes that this is true. That this is true—is not, at all creditable to the farmers, whatever it may be to those representing the other side of the question. That they will quietly submit to the wrongs perpetrated on them, I for one confess is humiliating. But the evil has grown up so gradually and has become such a part of the general business system of the country, that it is only lately that intelligent thought has been given to the subject. I admire the enterprise of the farmers mentioned by your Wadena correspondent, but unfortunately there are few neighborhoods where the farmers are able to build such an elevator as is required by the railroad company. We must then fall back on the cause of all the evil, and look there for the remedy. It is also a fact beyond discussion that the railway companies will only haul wheat for the elevator men; that merchants, farmers or other business men cannot get cars for shipping grain, nor will they allow flat warehouses to be built on their tracks, nor receive wheat from warehouses built on private property. A farmer looking over the market reports may conclude that the Milwaukee market is his best one, or that it is for his interest to ship his crop to some commission house in St. Paul or Minneapolis, with orders to sell in the open market, but he finds on investigation that his only chance to dispose of his crop is to haul to the nearest elevator and take such grades and prices as they choose to give him.

That it is more convenient for the railroads to have their cars loaded from large elevators, is undeniably true. It is probably equally true that the merchants of our city would prefer to sell 100 packages of goods to a customer rather than one but if his customer only wants or needs one he as cheerfully sells the smaller as the greater amount. In other business enterprises than railroading, men do not expect to have everything just as they would best like it. It is a fact beyound dispute that were it not for the present policy of the railway companies—which seems to be to throw the whole grain trade into the hands of a few men—such arrangements as now oppress the industry o the country could not exist for a week. The following practical questions suggest themselves in the consideration of the subject:

First—Have the transportation companies any legal right to say that no man shall ship grain unless he is rich enough to first build an elevator such as would best suit their convenience?

Second—Have they the legal right to say that the grain trade of the Northwest belongs to any one special class of men?

Third—Have they the legal right to say that one man must pay more for the same service than anothe?

Forth—Have they the legal right to say to the farmers of the country, practically, that they shall not have the privilege of sending their products to such markets as their interests may demand by paying a fair rate of transportation for the same?

Fifth—Is it good public policy for them to discriminate as they now do, between classes and individuals, bestowing their favors on the men who handle our wheat crop to the deteriment and injury of the men who produce it?

Sixth—Would not the whole business interests of our Western States be greatly benefited, and an increased area of prosperity be the result of a more broad and far reaching policy on their part; a policy which would treat every man alike, the humblest and poorest as well as the rich—a policy which should give every man the opportunity to reap the full reward of his industry—encourage the energy and enterprise of our people and promot good feeling?

Practically, the business would be done in a way to forward their interests much as now; for, was there no discrimination, and the markets open to every man alike, the men now having money invested in the wheat business would be content with a fair margin of profit, and as this is all the farmer asks they would sell their grain to them cheerfully rather than to be to the trouble of shipping it themselves. If abuses sprang up, the remedy would be in their own hands, and the evil would correct itself. If all classes felt they had equal rights, and those rights were fairly accorded them, instead of as now men saying they would not break another acre of land (there would be on all hands firm determination to improve our new country to the utmost; the people of the country would feel a just pride in our railroads, a just pride in the growth and prosperity of our cities, and we of the Northwest would become a prosperous and united people.

DAKOTA FARMER.

The Question at Issue.

Editor Grand Forks News:

The farmers of the Red River Valley have now had a visit from manager Manvel and the representatives of the Elevator companies. It was prematurely sprung upon the people, and it is believed purposely, so that they might not have an opportunity to be prepared and was exactly what the Herald said it would be, viz: a farce. The fact is they came on a fishing excursion but the public would not bite at the bait which they had to offer. What does the whole thing amount to? Will it restore to the farmers the vast sum of money of which they have been robbed this season? Does it give any guarantee for next season? This oily talk will do to tickle the ears of fools, but the people are not so gullible as these representatives of monopoly take them to be. Is Mr. Pillsbury or Mr. Manvel so verdant as to suppose that the people of this country will believe that it is easier, cheaper and better to carry their produce 750 miles to reach an open market than to carry them 250 milesb for when wheat or flour reaches Chicago via Minneapolis and St. Paul it is practically no nearer to its ultimate markets (New York or Liverpool) than it would be at Duluth, and yet freights must be paid for 500 miles more of overland carriage. Is Mr. Manvel or Mr. Pillsbury so sublimely simple as to believe and try to make our people believe that our best interests require that we should have but one company to buy our grain and only one to carry it, whose rules on freight charges, grades and prices are practically absolute? We fear that these gentlemen are like Richard III, "too to dish, childish for this world." They are perhaps like the California prophet who believed that he would not die but that when his time came angels would descend and bear him gently to his home on high.

Now it is perhaps presumption for ordinary mortals to trust their own opinions in contradiction of those of such pre-eminent business men as Mr. Manvel and Mr. Pillsbury. Mr. Pillsbury stated, we believe, that he did not hold himself responsible for his opinions but he was ready to back up his facts. Well, he will get some facts on January 29th. But suppose we give one fact illustrating the benefits of the one railroad system which Mr. Pillsbury thinks so beneficial to a country. A firm in Crookston ordered goods from New York via the Lakes and the freight charges from Glyndon to Crookston, a distance of 80 or 90 miles, was about the same as from New York to Glyndon, a distance of 1,600 miles. It is well known that freights from the seaboard to St. Paul are not usually greater than freights from St. Paul here, yet there are several railroads coming into St. Paul from the East. Verily, people must be fools who desire more than one way of getting goods out of a country or into it. Suppose we give a few more facts. From Duluth to Buffalo wheat is carried for two cents a bushel, from Buffalo to New York City over the Erie Canal for 3½ cents per bushel, from Grand Forks to Duluth 10 cents is all that any reasonable system of tariffs would allow. Storage in Duluth is one cent per bushel per month, add seven cents for six months on invested capital, say 3½ cents per bushel and handling charges 2½ cents per bushel. Then we have, while navigation is open, 10 cts. plus 2½ cts. plus 2 cts. plus 3½ cts., or a total of 18 cents per bushel from Grand Forks to New York City and in Winter suppose the wheat to have been boght and stored in the fall we have 10 cents plus 2 cents plus, 3½ cents plus 6 cents, plus 3½ cents, plus 2½ cents, or a total of 27½ cents to New York City. No doubt much better than this can be done when the system is put into good working order. When the demand justifies it, no doubt sufficient elevator capacity will be provided at Duluth. Farmers who can afford to store wheat in their own granaries will not only save storrage and interest but get the benefit of the spring rise in price. The truth of the matter is simply this: Minneapolis and St. Paul want to direct the commerce of the entire Northwest out of its natural channels and for their own profit undoubtedly. They care nothing and from the nature of things can care nothing for the prosperity of this section except in so far as that prosperity may contribute to their wealth. If the prosperity of this section is brought about by turning its commerce away from Minneapolis and St. Paul into its direct and natural channel they must certainly be opposed to it notwithstanding Mr. Manvel's talk. These cities are represented in an organized form by the M. & M. R. R., the elevator company and the Miller's Association. Through them their work is done. It is a matter of business with them to get our wheat as cheaply as possible; to get the best price they can get for carrying it, and to shut off all competition, even though they have shown their inability to use or handle it as they should. They want our wheat, anyhow, even under a wretched system grading, handling, and carrying, and a necessarily increased cost of transportation to its final market, and they come here and talk to us about cattle-raising, to divert attention from the main question. The manner in which each sustained and endorsed the statements of the others not differing on the slightest point, all agreeing that everything was right and that the farmers must, of course, be a set of sore-heads, is good evidence that the relations between the parties is simply this; "you tickle me and, I'll tickle you."

The complaints began two months ago, but they did not come until the robbery was consummated, and now they tell us everything is all right. The men who have raised crops only to sacrifice them know that everything is not all right, and they know the remedy will not be applied by the very men who inflicted the injury; but they know the remedy themselves, and will apply it.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,

East Grand Forks.

January 21st, 1884.

To the Farmers and Business Men of Polk County, Minn.:

Feeling more deeply than ever the oppression of the two great monopolies—railroads and elevators—which are sapping the very foundation of thrift and prosperity of the Red River Valley, by excessive freight rates and the unjust system of grading and handling of wheat, whereby they are robbing the farmer and the merchant alike, the people of the Northwest are clamoring for relief from this hydra-headed monster—monopoly—and fully realize that they must pool their issues, combine their strength, and unite, as one man, if they wish to throw open wide the gates for the importation and exportation of those commodities which are the essentials to make this country thrifty and wealthy. To bring about this new era of prosperity, another other than the Manitoba Railroad furnishes, must be secured by the people, and, believing that the projected railroad, viz: the Grand Forks, Crookston & Lake Superior, will best serve the ends sought and desired, the Chamber of Commerce, of East Grand Forks, Minn., invites every citizen, whether he be farmer, merchant or mechanic, to meet in East Grand Forks, on SATURDAY, January 26, at 1 o'clock, p. m., at the school house, when a general mass meeting will be held. Good speakers, who have made a study of this vital question, which is now staring us in the face, will be in attendance, and explain the route of and the means proposed to build the projected railroad. Let there be such a turning out of Polk County farmers as will startle the monopolists and cause them to release the iron grip which they have already secured upon our very homes.

F. J. DUFFY, Secretary.
J. W. HOWES, President.
By order Chamber of Commerce.

Glyndon News: All Clay county people will feel lively sympathy with Mr. Benedict Howard, county attorney, on hearing that he has sufferred loss of his leg, for treatment of which he has been in St. Paul the past two months. Amputation was performed last week. The injury dates from a fall on the ice a year ago. The serious nature of the injury was not realized for many months—only a slight lameness at times. But it transpired that there was a fracture of one of the bone below the knee, a loose fragment of which caused the formation of abcesses so threatening as to necessitate cutting off the leg to save Mr. Howard's life His symptoms since the operation are reported encouraging by Mr. Comstock, who called at the hospital and visited the sufferer on Tuesday.

Nasby's Paper

THE

Toledo Weekly Blade.

CIRCULATION 115,000.

This vast circulation is because the Blade is a paper for the whole country. It is not thrown together, but every line of it is edited by competent hands. It is a complete epitome of the news of the week, and whoever reads the Blade carefully, needs nothing else to be well informed as to what the world is doing. Editorially the Blade has made a proud record. It has an opinion on everything that effects the people of the country, and it expresses it boldly, fearlessly and forcibly. As good as the Blade has been in the past years, we shall make it better than ever in the year to come.

Among the features for the coming year will be the regular "Nasby Letters," two serials by Nasby, entitled "Nasby in Exile," and "Nasby in the South," a serial story by Ernest Warren, entitled "Court and Camp;" a serial by John McElroy, author of Andersonville, "Reminiscences of an Army Mule;" a serial written for the Blade by an Austrian Nobleman; besides our regular departments, "Household," "Answers to Correspondents" "Camp Fire," etc., etc. We publish all the news and latest corrected markets.

Politically the Blade will continue an exponent of true Republicanism, believing that the best interests of the country demand the continuance of its control in the hands of the party that represents the highest and most advanced ideas.

THE RUM POWER.

The Blade will fight this monster iniquity with all the power it possesses and in every way possible. The Blade holds the liquor traffic to be a greater curse than slavery, and a thousand times more dangerous to the country.

We ask the co-operation of every well-wisher of the Republic that our work may be effective. We ask every Republican in the United States to assist in extending the circulation of the Blade, especially among those of the Republican party who believe as we do in the necessity of Pulverizing the Rum Power. We want the Blade in as many families as possible this winter, that it may be read before the excitement of a political campaign, giving it time for its truths to take root in the minds of its readers.

THE WEEKLY BLADE, $1.00 a year, postpaid to everybody. Those preferring may receive the Blade Three Months by remitting 30 cents, or clubs of three months trial subscribers, of not less than four, 25 cents each.

OUR GREAT ART OFFER.

The Pioneer Press correspondent, C. M. S., has been out on the Hastings & Dakota railroad and finds about the same state of things as here if, indeed it be not worse. We do not rejoice at the misfortunes of our neighbors but as "misery likes company" it is not wrong to rejoice that the St. Paul Chicago & Milwaukee R. R. is worse to deal with than ours. The correspondent says:

There is no such thing as a free market line. The plan adopted by the St. Paul road in the matter of elevators, is not to allow more than one elevator to be erected at a station unless the second be of equal capacity to the one already built. This fact, in addition to the transit business, and the flat refusal to make local rates on wheat shipments is doing much to injure the development of the country, and has the effect of greatly depressing business. The results of such a system are beginning to be felt by all classes of settlers along the line of the road, and the complaints on this score are loud and deep. Business is extremely dull in all the towns along the road, and business men attribute the fact to the evil results of the present elevator and transit systems. The low price of wheat is attributed as the cause of the present depression; and while this is not the only cause, there is no doubt that it cuts a very large figure in the general result. The price of No. 1 hard wheat in Milwaukee to-day is 71 cents, and for No. 1 regular, 67 cents. The price of No. 1. hard wheat in Minneapolis is 97½ @ 98 cents, and for No. 1 regular, 88 @ 89 cents. The elevator charge for handling and buying is four cents, freight charges, transit rate, making allowance for the discount 12 cents a bushel, making a total of 16 cents a bushel for wheat on board the cars here. This leaves a margin, above all expense, of five cents a bushel, or a total profit of nine cents a bushel, after paying freight to the elevators. This difference is exhorbitant, and cannot be justified by any legitimate course of reasoning. The farmers are helpless, as they are not given the benefit of an open market, and are compelled to sell their wheat for whatever the elevator men choose to give them. Merchants of this city who wanted to make arrangements with the railroad company last fall by which they could buy wheat or take it on debt, and ship on their own account, were flatly refused by the company. Investigation shows that the complaints and assertions of farmers regarding unjust discrimination in the matter of markets, and the unreliable system of grading are as a rule true. Elevator agents themselves have admitted to me that the present system of grading is wrong and an injury to the farmer, but they of course fell back on the plea that they are governed entirely by Minneapolis grades. One agent admitted to me that nearly all wheat received as No. 2 hard went No. 1 hard in Minneapolis after cleaning. The dockage he said, was usually two to two and a half pounds, and this was sufficient to bring the wheat up to grade without further loss, of course if the wheat was not good enough to make No. 1 hard it was graded as No. 1 regular.

THE CAUSE OF LOW GRADE.

There is, of course, much complaint about low grades, and while there is some ground for these complaints, the real trouble dates back a year or two, and is the result of other causes. Last year the millers' association made no difference between hard and soft wheat, but simply paid soft wheat prices for everything. Consequently, farmers who had been raising hard wheat seeing that their neighbors who raised soft wheat, which yielded four or five bushels more per acre, got the same price for it that they receive for pure hard Fife, this year sowed soft seed. But when they brought this soft wheat to market they found that a difference of seven cents a bushel had been established between hard and soft varieties, and of course this produced great dissatisfaction and disgust. There is some smut in the wheat of this section this year, and this fact has had much the same effect as the frozen wheat of the North. The presence of smut, even in small quantities, has degraded almost the entire crop. The most of the wheat graded below hard has been reduced on account of smut. That this reduction has been too great there is not the least doubt, and the farmers have been compelled to suffer considerable loss on this score, for which they are not responsible.

THE RESULT.

Business men as well as farmers are greatly discouraged over the present condition of affairs in this section, and the subject is one of grave comment in every community. A banker of Mil[illegible] informed me that he considered the present system of placing the wheat buying business in the hands of a monopoly the most serious drawback to the development of the country that [illegible] had to contend with. The [illegible] farmers are constantly writing back to their friends in the States not to come out here, and of course do not fail to greatly exaggerate the real troubles which exist. He thought the effect of the low price of wheat this year, and the agitation which had been produced in consequence would do much to keep emigrants from coming into the Northwest next year. He told me that within the past two weeks nearly a dozen farmers in this county had either sold their farms for what they could get or allowed them to go under mortgage, and, after selling off their personal property, gone back East. He knew of ten such cases that had come under his personal observation, and he had no doubt that a great many more would be compelled to follow before another year. He thought that fully nineteen-twentieths of all the farms in Grant County were mortgaged, the past year had been a hard one, and a great many farmers were unable to pay the interest on their indebtedness and support their families. If they had good crops next year and the price of wheat was high they might be able to pull through, but if prices were as low as they have been this season a great many would be compelled to give up their homes and seek other locations. Merchants in all the towns I have visited are very free in their expressions concerning the present trouble, and do not hesitate to denounce the present system of monopoly, which they claim is the real cause. They say that their business has been injured greatly, and that unless the condition of things is changed before another year the results will certainly be disastrous. The universal cry is for a free market and equal facilities for shipment.

CHARGES AND COUNTERCHARGES

What is it All About?

Correspondent Warren Sheaf.

The farmers of the Red River Valley are charging the Millers' Association and the Manitoba Railroad Company with robbing them out of their hard-earned wheat crop, and the Millers' Association and the railroad officials are preferring equally damaging charges against the farmers. I am neither farmer, wheat buyer, or railroad man; only a quiet, disinterested observer; but my sympathies are always with the weak and down-trodden; hence I take sides with the Millers' Association and the poor, persecuted railroad officials. The rascally farmers know very well that the poor Millers' Association have spent almost their last dollar in building large elevators at every village and city along the entire line of the Manitoba Railroad, for the especial accommodation of the farmers, so as to prevent wheat from being sold on an open market to dishonest buyers, and to prevent the farmers from being cheated by this class of dealers, the Millers' Association have formed a combination with the railroad company, by which they together are enabled to keep out all outside, dishonest buyers and compel all the wheat to pass through the hands of two honest incorporations, whose benevolence and disinterested kindness is as well known to the public as household words; and still the farmers complain. I know no way to satisfy them they are so unreasonable. They would, doubtless, complain if they were all sentenced to be hanged. They are well aware that there is no other railroad to carry their wheat to market; they also know that it would be worthless if it could not be got to market, and yet they complain when the Manitoba Railroad Company kindly carry it to the Millers' Association at Minneapolis for the small sum of from 15 to 20 cents per bushel, while the Millers' Association are kindly willing to pay them from 50 to 65 cents per bushel for it at Minneapolis, dirt and all. A large portion of it is wild buckwheat, cockle, smut, etc. There is no mistake about this assertion, for the Millers' Association and the Manitoba Railroad Company sent a disinterested committee through the anti-monopoly people's newspaper, viz., the Pioneer Press. When it is known that it is composed of Mr. Pillsbury, the largest owner in the Millers' Association, and Mr. Manvel, the general manager of the Manitoba Railroad, it will be readily conceded that their mission could have no other object than pure benevolence and in the interest of the mutinous farmers, and pure, disinterested kindness towards the uncharitable public. How could the railroad company be expected to carry the farmers' wheat for a less price than above named? The railroad company having originally paid the exhorbitant price of thirteen cents on the dollar of first cost for the land grant, road, rolling stock, depots, and all the franchises of the road. Their land grant only embraced one half of all the tillable land in the Red River Valley, from Breckenridge north to the international boundary, and that is of little value when it will only produce cheat, smut and cockle, with a small sprinkling of No. 3 soft rejected and frosted wheat. The railroad company have not yet, after a lapse of five years from date of their purchase, succeeded in selling more than three-fourths of their land grant, and that at a great sacrifice—the price realized ranging probably from $5 to $40 per acre only. In view of all these facts staring me in the face, I am compelled, from a sense of justice, to agree with the investigating committee before named, viz. that it serves the farmers right to give them nothing for their frozen, worthless wheat, and let them learn to sow good No. 1 hard wheat; also let them sow it in February or March, and harvest it in May, stack it in June, and thresh it in July, before frost comes, and then ship it south to Florida to winter. This would be necessary to prevent it from freezing in the grain houses or elevators. I know that wheat will freeze and become worthless in the wheat houses, because one of the members of the Millers' Association who was interviewed by a Pioneer Press reporter some months since said that some of the wheat was frozen before it was cut, some in the stack, and the rest in the farmers' grain houses; so you see it was all compelled to be frozen, and in future it will have to be wintered in Florida. The gentleman above named was educated in Horace Greely's agricultural school. and he has since made a grand success at growing dried apples, ready cut and dried for market when picked from the trees. This was done by planting dried apples for seed. And now after this unequalled success in the apple business, it could not be doubted that he knows all about wheat culture.

I will have something more to say next week in defence of these down-trodden innocents.

OBSERVER.

The Case Misrepresented.

Grand Forks Herald.

It transpired that the Manvel-Pillsbury aggregation, lately exhibiting in the towns of North Dakota and Minnesota, did not have the whole stage at Crookston, as has been represented by interested parties and correspondents. The people there were expecting the show and they came armed with a just cause and many specific complaints. To say that Mr. Pillsbury succeeded in satisfying anybody there, that wrongs do not exist at his elevators, is simply to vastly stretch the truth. He merely sought to avoid the responsibility for the acts of his agents by saying that they had no instruction, to steal and that Pillsbury & Hulbert would make things right. Now, while it may be easy enough to bluff the timid and satisfy those aching in advance to be satisfied with such a course as Pillsbury pursued, it will be more than the whole fraudulent gang of Minneapolis millers and elevators can do in twenty years, to restore to the people of the Red River Valley what they have wronged them of, in the aggregate, and their good name for honesty. In order to accept the deductions of the railroad and elevator men and their namby-pamby adulators, it is necessary to assume that the farmers of the Northwest are as a rule dishonest, sharp, roguish fellows, who in their knavery have reduced the millers of Minneapolis to poverty and a financial crisis. It also implies that this country is good for nothing as a wheat land that the railroad company in advertising it as such in the East has committed a willful fraud on immigrants, to get them over its line into a frozen territory, where grow only wheat and "frosted wheat" which Pillsbury & Hulbert can't use for flour, without destroying a reputation built upon this very product of this very region. Of course, this involves a flat contradiction and absurdity. But Mr. Pillsbury and his friends are nothing, if not contradictory and full of guile. The whole thing from their standpoint, is a series of misrepresentations and plausible fallacies.

More Valuable than Ever.

We call our readers' attention to the value, usefulness and direct profit of supplying themselves this year with the American Agriculturist, the cheapest as well as the most valuable journal in the country. Every number contains one hundred columns of original reading matter, by the leading writers of the country, upon all topics connected with the farm, garden and household, and nearly one hundred engravings made specially for the American Agriculturist. The paper, now in its 43d year, is unquestionably more valuable than ever before. Each number brings fresh evidence that no time or [illegible] is considered where the interest of the paper is at stake. Its House Plans and Improvements, profusely illustrated, are worth more than any costly architectural works. Its persistent and fearless exposure of humbugs and swindling schemes is of great value to the whole country, particularly the farming community. In short it has something good and valuable for everybody. Owing to a special arrangement with the publishers, we are enabled to offer the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL and the American Agriculturist for one year, and the engravings, "Foes or Friends?" and "In the Meadow" for $2.35.

'ROUND HOME.

Judge F. Ives, of St. Hilaire is in the city.

Wheat took a jump of three cents Tuesday night reaching 70 for No. 1 Hard.

A grand masquerade will be given at the star skating rink on Saturday evening, February 2d.

We are told that scarlet fever and dyphtheria prevails to a considerable extent among the little ones in this city.

Tom Morris and brother took possession of their new store on Saturday and are getting regulated. They will have a neat and tasty shop when they get things regulated.

Mr. A. E. Johnson has returned from his visit to the old world. He reports that the prospects for immigration this year are good for as many as we have had heretofore.

Call at the new Palace jewelry store on Second Street and examine the goods. They are daily expecting the arrival of large additions to their already elegant stock of watches, clocks, jewelry etc.

Wheat has an upward tendency. On Saturday last it rose from 74 to 76 for No. 1 Hard and the prospects are good for a still higher price in the immediate future. It is safe to gamble on anything less than $1.

Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Hurlbut have been called upon to mourn the loss of their first born, a son five months old. He died on Saturday and was buried on Sunday. They have the sympathy of host of friends.

A slight fire in conductor Maxwell's house brought out the department on Saturday. Some bedding coming in contact with a hot stove pipe made things lively for a few minutes and did $100 damage or so.

If that St. Paul Globe was not a Democratic sheet it would be immense. Its market reports are the most reliable and its general news columns replete with all of the news of the day but its politics—O gosh!

On Wednesday the cases of the State vs Ben McKinney and the State vs Dave Carlton were tried resulting in a fine of $100 in each case. The State vs Pillard lasted until this afternoon.

Hon. B. Sampson writes that he has given up the idea of asking for an appropriation for a dam at the headwaters of the Red Lake River as he is fearful that it may interfere with the success of the Nelson pine land bill.

A large and enthusiastic meeting was held at Red Lake Falls on Tuesday to consider the proposition of bonding. It seems that they have had a very crude idea of the situation until it was fully explained, on Tuesday, and the sentiment seems to be largely in favor of bonding.

Wheat seems to be very uneasy in eastern markets, with a very pronounced upward tendency. The cause of the unusual January drop is no doubt the fact that the bulk of the wheat has been thrown upon the market more suddenly than in former years. Wheat is bound to rise.

Many farmers have concluded to summer fallow a large portion of their lands next season, and that is where their heads are level. If our soil is well cultivated we can raise as much wheat as ever and do it on one-half the land and with less expense. We should like to see this example followed by every farmer in the country.

The big Indian chief of the Red Lake Reservation was in the city this week. We are told that he came to dispose of a large quantity of pine logs that the Indians are getting out this winter. He intends to leave for Washington, with a few of his principal braves to lobby against the Washburn bill and in favor of the Nelson bill.

The officers of the Grand Forks' Crookston & Lake Superior railroad met at the office of Judge Reynolds on Monday night and elected E. C. Davis chief engineer and transacted other business of importance. It is expected that an election on the bond question will be called at an early day. The company intend to push things along the entire line during the coming summer.

The prospects for immigration into the Golden Northwest next spring seem greater than ever before, owing to the stress of hard times in the east. The Manitoba company report that they have never had more letters from the outside world than they are receiving this year inquiring about this country and they predict a large influx into the Northwest. If we succeed in obtaining the lands on the Red Lake Reservation, Polk County will get her share.

Mr. Chris Muggley a Crookston old-timer, is visiting friends in the city, looking for a location.

The electric now shines forth from the bell tower where it was placed for an experiment. It would do better on top of the tower.

Court convened on Wednesday Judge Chas. M. Start, of Rochester, presiding. Judge Stearns goes north on Saturday evening to try the election case in Marshall County.

NOTICE.

I desire to inform the public, and all my old patrons, that I am still the proprietor of the Crookston Nurseries, and that said nurseries have not been and will not be discontinued; and all statements made or published to the contrary are wholly untrue.

The late firm of Haseltine Bros. was dissolved in June, 1883, and the stock then in the nurseries was divided, and by agreement, and with my consent, E. W. Haseltine was permitted to leave his share of the old company stock remaining on the old nursery grounds to enable him to sell the same, but under the terms of said agreement said E. W. Haseltine must remove all his share of said stock from the Crookston Nurseries by the first day of June, 1884. I further desire to state that it is untrue that all correspondence in reference to the purchase and sale of stock in the old nursery name has been turned over to J. W. Lilly, Esq. The only matters turned over to said J. W. Lilly is the collecting of the bills and claims due to the late firm of Haseltine Bros. I shall continue to keep a full supply of forest trees and seeds for tree claims and the hardier varieties of small fruits such as will grow and bear in this country.

Washington News Notes.

The long-threatened retirement of John J. New from the office of assistant treasurer is finally announced as a fact. Mr. New appears to have packed up his belongings, left his resignation to be presented to the president on his return from New York, and quietly stolen away to Indianapolis. He is said to have been moved thereto by the pressure of private business.

Mr. Wakefield has introduced in congress a joint resolution fixing the head of navigation of the Minnesota river in the state of Minnesota. It fixes the head of navigation at a point on that river where the range line between ranges 33 and 34 west of the fifth principal meridian crosses the river, said range line being the eastern boundary of Redwood county.

The finance committee of the senate has refused to approve Mr. Sherman's bill to establish a basis of banking and also of Mr. McPherson's which provides an issue of circulation equal to the face of any government.

The drop in Northern Pacific first mortgage bonds from 101 3-4 to 95 1-2 has occasioned general comment and conjecture. These bonds, to the amount of $40 000,000, were issued in 1880 for the purpose of completing and equipping the road. They were secured by mortgage on the roadbed and all the lands of the company west of the Missouri river. The total grant amounted to about 40,000 000 acres. In November the whole 40,000,000 was sold to the Drexel, Morgan & Co. syndicate. The bonds have been fairly steady in price most of the time since, generally selling a little above par. The question now is whether the bonds have been too high.

The Winona, Alma & Northern surveyors are now at work between La Crosse and Winona.

The Union Pacific surplus earnings for the year were $11,391,658.

General News Gossip.

James Griffen, a young farmer of York township, Ohio, near Bellaire, invited his neighbors to a butchering the 19th. After the party gathered a fire was started with logs from an old cabin that had been torn down last spring, and the logs piled up for future use. After the fire had been burning for some time a young man noticed that one of the logs was hollow, and taking a poker, he gave it a punch. To the surprise and astonishment of all present some $20 gold pieces rolled out into the fire. The logs were rapidly pulled off the fire, and a general search was made. Gold pieces of all denominations were found ranging from $1 to $20, and the total sum was something over $10,000. Who owned it nobody knows.

The announcement is made that nearly all the rail mills, iron works, furnaces, and stove foundries of St. Louis, are either closed or running at half their capacity; that all glass works are closed and there is great depression among all classes, throwing perhaps 8,000 men out of employment and withdrawing a very large sum of money from circulation, which has heretofore been paid for wages.

J. B. and W. H. Anderson, grain dealers millers, bankers, of Menden, Mich., have failed. They had been in business there sixteen years and were considered solid. The business was quite extensive. No statement is furnished. A large amount of money reported locked up in the Cadillac failure the last two months was probably the cause of the firm's embarrassment.

Bradstreet's Journal furnishes the following: There was 310 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreet's during the week, ending the 26th, 11 less than the preceding week, 21 more than the corresponding week of 1883, and 105 more than the same week of 1882. About 80 per cent. were those of small traders whose capital was less than $5,000.

The Criminal Record.

Four weeks ago, upon information furnished by the German consul at New York, Herman Koerstein living in Chicago, was arrested for the embezzlement of 7,000 marks in Bromberg, Prussia. An officer bearing extradition papers from the German government arrived in Chicago the 24th. That afternoon a deputy sheriff went to Koerstein's cell, with the purpose of bringing him out for transfer to the officer. As the prisoner was about to leave the cell he drank what appeared to be a glass of water. Accompanying the deputy to the office, the prisoner staggered, dropped in a chair, shaking violently, whispered, "I am sick," and expired in twenty minutes. Koerstein had drank a deadly solution of cyanite of potassium. Half an ounce of the drug was found in his pocket. He was highly educated, and once stood high in Bromberg. He had been in this country four months. He leaves a wife in Germany and two young sons in Chicago.

A BELLE'S DISHONOR.

A Rich Woman to Be Sued for Bigamy by Her Husband.

From the Philadelphia Times.

The facts in a remarkable criminal suit, in which well-known Philadelphia people figure prominently, have just been made public by a preliminary action before one of the city magistrates.

Application was made to Governor Pattison a few days ago for a requisition for the arrest of Mrs. Belan, nee Miss Mary Solomon, for many years a young society belle of Brooklyn. On account of technical informalities in the papers the requisition was refused, with permission to renew it when the facts in the case were placed before his Excellency. The charge of bigamy is preferred by the lady's husband, Henry Benedetti Belan, a wealthy New Orleans merchant, now living in New York, where he has acquired residence for the purpose of beginning the prosecution.

The story is a very curious one. About three years ago Miss Solomon, who then dwelt in Brooklyn, on Pierrepont street, near Wall street ferry, left her home unknown to her parents. She was an attractive young lady and had many admirers. Her presence had been noticed at nearly every reception given on Brooklyn Heights. After being absent from home for nearly six months she wrote to her parents notifying them that she had married Henry Benedetti Belan, of New Orleans, where she was then living. They had taken up their residence at a prominent hotel in that city. The clerk of the house, Simon Johnes, showed much attention to Mr. and Mrs. Belan, and it is said that no sooner had they engaged quarters in the hotel than an intimacy sprang up between the clerk and Mrs. Belan, which, though not noticed by the husband, was remarked by all the boarders.

One evening about a year after his marriage the husband returned from a trip into the interior and found the rooms which he had occupied during his stay vacant. Two days elapsed before he ascertained that his wife, child, and the managing clerk had left for parts unknown. After putting private detectives on their track Mr. Belan ascertained that the trio had come on to New York and had there taken up their residence on Thirty-sixth street. In order to obtain the legal status in regard to some property the erring wife and her companion are said to have been married, she taking the risk of being indicted for bigamy. Then, under the advice of a lawyer that they could escape criminal liability, they came to Philadelphia and were married privately again. They have been living together in this city ever since. The husband by counsel, made a complaint on Friday before a police magistrate of this city for his wife's arrest on the ground of bigamy, and for Simon Johnes' arrest on the ground of adultery. The warrants were issued. The papers were sent to Pennsylvania and a requisition was applied for. The Governor is said to have declared that when a well authenticated certificate of marriage from New Orleans was produced and filed a requisition would not be necessary. The woman and the clerk can then be arrested and tried for the offence in Philadelphia, instead of sending them to New Orleans. From reports received it is stated that Mrs. Belan, who is quite rich, intends to leave her companion and return to her relatives in Brooklyn. Several attorneys are engaged on the case and hope to bring it to a speedy trial.

Scrofula

Usually develops in early life, and is a peculiar morbid condition of the system, usually affecting the glands, often resulting in swellings, enlarged joints, abscesses, thickening of the lips, enlarged neck, sore eyes. A scrofulous condition is often hereditary but bad diet, too free use of fat meats, bad air, want of sunshine and nourishing food will induce it. Some people are troubled with scrofulous swelling of the glands, and with ulcers and kernels, which may cause very little pain; others may have inward scrofula, scrofula of the lungs, scrofula of the spleen, scrofula of the kidneys and scrofula of the bones. BURDOCK BLOOD BITTERS will drive away any case of scrofula, and not to appear in another place, for their action on the blood and bowels will carry the disease entirely from the body.

OUT OF THE DEPTHS.

Our Correspondent's Researches and a Remarkable Occurrence He Describes.

ST. ALBANS, Vt., January 10, 1884.

Messrs. Editors: The upper portion of Vermont is one of the pleasantest regions in America during the summer and one of the bleakest during the winter. It affords ample opportunity for the tourist, providing he chooses the proper season, but the present time is not that season. Still there are men and women here who not only endure the climate, but praise it unstintingly, and that too in the face of physical hardships the most intense. The writer heard of a striking illustration of this a few days since which is given herewith:

Mr. Joseph Jacques is connected with the Vermont Central railroad in the capacity of master mason. He is well advanced in years, with a ruddy complexion and hale appearance, while his general bearing is such as to instantly impress one with his strict honor and integrity. Several years ago he became afflicted with the most distressing troubles, which prevented the prosecution of his duties. He was languid, and yet restless, while at times a dizziness would come over him which seemed almost blinding. His will power was strong, and he determined not to give way to the mysterious influence which seemed undermining his life. But the pain and annoying symptoms were stronger than his will, and he kept growing gradually worse. About that time he began to notice a difficulty in drawing on his boots, and it was by the greatest effort that he was able to force his feet into them. In this manner several weeks passed by, until finally one night, while in great agony, he discovered that his feet had, in a short while, swollen to enormous proportions. The balance of the narrative can best be described in his own words. He said:

"When my wife discovered the fact that I was so bloated, she sent for the doctor immediately. He made a most careful examination and pronounced me in a very serious condition. Notwithstanding his care, I grew worse, and the swelling of my feet gradually extended upward in my body. The top of my head pained me terribly; indeed, so badly that at times it seemed almost as if it would burst. My feet were painfully cold, and even when surrounded with hot flannels and irons felt as if a strong wind were blowing on them. Next my right leg became paralyzed. This gave me no pain, but it was exceedingly annoying. About this time I began to spit blood most freely, although my lungs were in perfect condition, and I knew it did not come from them. My physicians were careful and untiring in their attentions, but unable to relieve my sufferings. My neighbors and friends thought I was dying and many called to see me, fully twenty-five on a single Sunday that I now recall. At last my agony seemed to culminate in the most intense, sharp pains I have ever known or heard of. If red hot knives sharpened to the highest degree had been run through my body constantly they could not have hurt me worse. I would spring up in bed, sometimes as much as three feet, cry out in my agony and long for death. One night the misery was so intense that I arose and attempted to go into the next room, but was unable to lift my swollen feet above the little threshold that obstructed them. I fell back upon the bed and gasped in my agony, but felt unable even to breathe. It seemed like death.

"Several years ago Rev. Dr. J. E. Rankin, now of Washington, was stationed here as pastor of the Congregational church. We all admired and respected him, and my wife remembered seeing somewhere that he had spoken in the highest terms of a preparation which had cured some of his intimate friends. We determined to try this remedy, accordingly sent for it, and, to make a long story short, it completely restored my health, brought me back from the grave, and I owe all I have in the way of health and strength to Warner's Safe Cure, better known as Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. I am positive that if I had taken this medicine when I felt the first symptoms above described, I might have avoided all the agony I afterward endured, to say nothing of the narrow escape I had from death."

In order that all possible facts bearing upon the subject might be known, I called on Dr. Oscar F. Fassett, who was for nineteen years United States Examining Surgeon, and who attended Mr. Jacques during his sickness. He stated that Mr. Jacques had a most pronounced case of Albuminuria or Bright's disease of the kidneys. That an analysis showed the presence of albumen and casts in great abundance and that he was in a condition where few if any ever recover. His recovery was due to Warner's Safe Cure.

Mr. John W. Hobart, General Manager of the Vermont Central railroad, states that Jacques was one of the best and most faithful of his employes, that his sickness had been an exceedingly severe one and the company were not only glad to have his services, but grateful to the remedy that had cured so valuable a man.

Mr. James M. Foss, assistant superintendent and master mechanic of the Vermont Central railroad is also able to confirm this.

I do not claim to be a great discoverer but I do think I have found in the above a most, remarkable case and knowing the unusual increase of Bright's disease feel that the public should have the benefit of it. It seems to me that a remedy that can accomplish so much in the last stages ought to do even more for the first approach of this deceptive yet terrible trouble.

Blessed Benefactors.

When a board of eminent physicians and chemists announced the discovery that by combining some well-known valuable remedies, the most wonderful medicine was produced, which would cure such a wide range of diseases that most all other remedies could be dispensed with, many were skeptical; but proof of its merits by actual trial has dispelled all doubt, and to-day the discoverers of that great medicine, Hop Bitters, are honored and blessed by all as benefactors. These Bitters are compounded from Hops, Buchu, Malt, Mandrake and Dandelion and other oldest, best and most valuable medicines in the world and contain all the best and most curative properties of all other medicines, being the greatest Blood Purifier, Kidney and Liver Regulator, and life and health restoring agent on earth. No disease or ill health can possibly long exist where these Bitters are used, so varied and perfect are their operations.

They give new life and vigor to the aged and infirm. To all whose employments cause irregularity of the bowels or urinary organs, or who require an Appetizer, Tonic and mild Stimulant, these Bitters are invaluable, being highly curative, tonic and stimulating, without intoxicating.

No matter what your feelings or symptoms are, what the disease or ailment is, use Hop Bitters. Don't wait until you are sick, but if you only feel bad or miserable, use the Bitters at once. It may save your life. Hundreds have been saved by so doing. $500 will be paid for a case they will not cure or help.

Do not suffer yourself or let your friends suffer, but use and urge them to use Hop Bitters.

Remember, Hop Bitters is the purest and best medicine ever made; the "Invalid's friend and hope." No person or family should be without them.

"I was troubled for many years with serious Kidney and Liver Complaint, Gravel, etc.; my blood became thin; I was dull and inactive; could hardly crawl about, and was an old worn out man all over, and could get nothing to help me, until I got Hop Bitters, and now I am a boy again. My blood is pure, kidneys are all right, and I am as active as a man of 30, although I am 72.—FATHER.

"For ten years my wife was confined to her bed with such a complication of ailments that no doctor could tell what was the matter or cure her, and I used up a small fortune in humbug stuff. Six months ago I saw a U. S. flag with Hop Bitters on it, and I thought I would be a fool once more, and I tried it, but my folly proved to be wisdom, and two bottles cured her, she is now as well and strong as any man's wife, and it cost me only two dollars.

Things in General.

Germany discovers the fact that tradesmen, manufacturers and tavern or restaurant keepers are the most usual matrimonial candidates. Both sexes ask most about money, next about intelligence, and least about religious belief.

An oleander at Spanish Town, Fla., covers a space of ground 36 feet in diameter. It is divided into 20 or 25 separate stems, the longest of which is 25 feet high. The group is at least five feet through and one single stem is 14 inches thick.

The Philadelphia Bulletin makes this frank admission: "Newspapers can make and unmake presidents, they can overturn corruption, they can forward great enterprises, but they are helpless to convince a single woman that decollete dresses, or high-heeled shoes, or wasp-waists are ruinous to health and deleterious to morals." It is but fair to explain that the Bulletin, in using the term, "a single woman," does not except married women.

A New York correspondent writes: "An inquiry at the Christian association brought the reply that $15 per week is the highest pay any woman can hope for either as teacher or book-keeper. The best pay is earned by a few experienced housekeepers, who are in the service of the rich families, and receive $1,000 per year and board. Some artificial flower makers earn $18 per week at this season of the year, and there are hundreds of well-trained women who would be glad to earn from $8 to $10 a week, while there are thousands whose earnings are from $3 to $6."

Somebody has been unearthing a lot of old depositions in a Kentucky clerk's office, and taking notes of the bad spelling of some of the great men of the past. A deposition in the handwriting of Andrew Jackson contains such spelling as "refference," "deponants," "untill," "ballance," "vallue," and dificult." Old Hickory's use of capitals was quite remarkable. Such words as "Dollar" and "Money" he capitalized, while he also wrote "almighty God."

The capitalist who sits down and lends his money for the highest rate of interest that he can get is a drone in the social hive compared with the active man of business who builds mills, factories and furnaces, and gives remunerative employment to hundreds of needy people.

Millemaine is the name of a new cereal which has been introduced into South Carolina from Columbia, South America. It is allied to sorghum and Guinea corn, and has the merit of an almost unlimited capacity to endure drouth. Cakes made from the meal have been described as better than corn cakes, and the grain has been pronounced by the chemist of the Savannah Guane Company superior in food qualities to wheat.

According to Dr. Sach, of Buenos Ayres, there is no danger of an exhaustion of the quinine supply. The experimental plantations in Java and the Island of Reunion have been very successful; and, besides these nurseries, the trees have been cultivated in Bolivia by the million for ten years. At three places in the last-named country, taken as they come, the number of trees growing is given, severally, at 700,000, 200,000, and 3,500,000.

The past season has again been very discouraging to oyster cultivators in England and the conviction has been forced upon them that further experiments will be only a waste of money. From one end of the southern coast of England to the other, thousands of pounds have been expended in endeavoring to protect the spawn at spawning time, but without the least sign of success. The cause of the failure is the want of temperature. Only native oysters will breed in the estuaries of the Thames, but of late years the summers have been so short and cold that there has been very little spat, and this is the reason of the scarcity and the consequent dearness of the "native" which the English esteem as the best of all oysters. Artificial breeding in England has been a failure. The only real success in the artificial breeding of oysters has been achieved at Arcachon, in the south of France, but even there, during the last two or three wet summers, the crop of spat has been only about one-fourth of what it has usually been.

HE DIDN'T FLAG THE TRAIN.

Big Bill Dempsey Taught Jim Ransom a Lesson Which He Will Never Forget.

A few engineers and firemen were sitting around a coil of steam pipe in the round-house telling their yarns. Among them was a pale young man, who had lost his health in a dry goods store and just engaged as an extra fireman.

"I never was so mad," said Big Bill Dempsey, "as I was when I licked Jim Ransom fur not flaggin' me."

"When was that? asked one of the firemen.

"Le's see, said Bill, thoughtfully, "that was in '79—the year they put in the Clarion side-track."

"For what offence did you punish him?" asked the pale young man.

"Hey?"

"What did you whip him for?"

"Waall," said Bill, "the confounded ejiot stopped down in the Kewanee holter, an' never sent no man back to flag me. I was a comin' down the hill lickety-split when I seen his way car. I had the old '70,' with twenty-four cars, an' hadn't no idee I could stop 'er, but I flung 'er over an' give 'er the plug fur all she was worth. I tore her ole fire all out, but I got 'er by the neck all the same. She stopped within three feet of Jim Ransom's way-car. Thunder an' sour milk, but I was mad! Jim was standin there, as rabbed as a woman on a crossin', an' says, "You infernal ejiot, why didn't you send nobody back to flag me?" "By gosh, Bill," says 'e, "I'll be darned if I didn't furgit it." "Oh, you did eh?" says I, an' I jumped down out o' that gangway an' give him the eternalist wallopin' he ever got."

"Why did you not report him to the superintendent, and have him removed for such gross carelessness?" said the pale young man.

"Say, look a-here, young feller, I'l give you a dead straight pointer," replied Bill. "If you're a commin on this road with them sort o' ideas, the quicker you don't come the better fur you. If it's good health you want, you jest rent out them air notions to some feller with kid gloves. Yes, I'd look pretty, I would, a-going' an' reportin' a man that got a family to take care of, an' have 'im throwed out of a job in the dead o' winter. Young feller, them ideas may do fur counter jumpers, but they hain't good fur notnin' to railroad with."—Chicago News.

THE SONG OF THE CAMP.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

"Give us a song!" the soldiers cried,
The outer trenches guarding,
When the heated guns of the camps allied
Grew weary of bombarding.

The dark Redan, in silent scoff,
Lay, grim and threatening under;
And the tawny mound of the Malakoff
No longer belched its thunder.

There was a pause. The guardsman said
"We storm the forts to-morrow;
Sing while we may another day
Will bring enough of sorrow."

They lay along the battery's side,
Below the smoking cannon;
Brave hearts from Severn and from Clyde,
And from the banks of Shannon.

They sang of love and not of fame,
Forgot was Britain's glory;
Each heart recalled a different name,
But all sang "Annie Lawrie."

Voice after voice caught up the strain,
Until its tender passion
Rose like an anthem, rich and strong—
Their battle-eve concession.

Dear girl, her name he dared not speak,
But, as the song grew louder,
Something upon the soldier's cheek
Washed off the stains of powder.

Beyond the darkening ocean burned
The bloody sunset's embers,
While in Crimea valleys learned
How English love remembers.

And once again a fire of hell
Rained in the Russian quarters,
With scream of shot, and burst of shell,
And bellowing of the mortars.

And Irish Nora's eyes are dim,
For a singer dumb and gory,
And English Mary mourns for him
Who sang of "Annie Lawrie."

Sleep, soldiers! still in honored rest
Your truth and valor wearing;
The bravest are the tenderest—
The loving are the daring.

RURAL ENGLAND.

Holiday Visiting and Country Life.

London Correspondence Boston Herald.

To know anything whatever of the peace and love and joy of English home life, one must see this home life in the country. It is true that it is the English custom to have only the family and family circle in the house for the distinctive festivities of the holiday, but visitors are invited just before and after. The custom is getting less rigidly observed with every year, and now it is not uncommon to have "town" friends with the family through a fortnight ending with the new year, which is not observed at all. Among other such visits the most vivid in my memory is the very first I ever made to a country house in England. It was all so new to me, so bright and picturesque, so full of all I had read, as though it belonged to the old centuries and not a part of the new life of a busy commercial age that it came upon me making and leaving the impressions of a dream. That is the Christmas-tide at an English country house that I hold in mind most in relief and grateful love. It was an old hall in the mid-lands, and one of the most famous pack of hounds in England had their master living close at hand, and the "meets" were always in the immediate neighborhood. Children, grand-children and a few friends were the guests in the house of the "lord of the manor." My invitation to be of the number was clothed in language most touching to me at the time, for I was almost a stranger in a strange land, although I had made dear friends of certain relatives of the family. The note to me made it plain that it was not an affection of form, but that my acceptance would really, in the estimate of my host, confer a favor upon himself and his household. At the close of the note there was some such sentence as this: "Perhaps you will kindly bring 'No. 3.'" What on earth "No. 3" was I had no means of knowing. Up to that time, as well as up to this time, I had read no book of etiquette on the "Manners and Customs of Good Society." I knew it could not mean my own napkin ring, and I had no notion that it did mean my own valet. However, I found out through the friendly offices of a courteous friend that my valet was "No. 3," and it was supposed that I would not be wholly comfortable without a personal servant, an accepted custom in families and with gentlemen of "high degree" in England. I took the train to the station, and was there met, after a ride of an hour, by the foot-man who led me to a carriage, and "No 3" was provided with a cab which took him and the luggage on ahead of my carriage. It was quite dark when I arrived at the hall, and the fall of the day was chilly and damp. Upon alighting from the carriage, the door was instantly opened by a lackey of the most gracious manners and of the greatest readiness of service. In the great open square "hall" was an enormous blazing fire in a fireplace itself almost as big as an ordinary room. I was at once led to my bedroom, where already "No. 3" was in attendance. The lackey told me the dinner hour and said I must be shown the way to the drawing room by my servant. While I dressed "No. 3," made his toilet also, as he had been requested to assist in serving at table. It is a useful and sensible custom to have one's own servant, valet or footman, to accompany one to dinner parties to assist. A few minutes before 7:30 I was shown to the drawing room, where already were gathered the family and most of the guests. Up to now, I had seen no one but servants, but, when my name was announced, the host and daughter moved forward toward me and I was received with warmest cordiality. I had seen already in London dimly lighted houses, especially drawing rooms, but really this was so dark I could only, with difficulty, recognize faces. Of course, vulgar gas was excluded from the house. Here and there in this great, old-fashioned room, were lamps upon little tables and a few candles. And in every instance they were shaded so as to subdue and soften the light. The room was like a "whispering gallery." Everybody was talking, but talking as if in whispers. This was the tone of speech through the dinner and until the ladies left the table, and then conversation began general and in somewhat louder voice, though well-bred English people never speak in a loud voice.

We sat at the table perhaps half an hour after the ladies had left, when after dinner wines and coffee were served, and then we joined the ladies in the drawing room, where tea was served. Here the conversation became general, and as animated as drawing room conversation ever is, or perhaps ever ought to be. Then a little music, also a "rubber at whist"; then the gentleman repaired to the billiard room for smoking, billiards and—"brandy and soda." Perhaps I ought to say I had never up to that time seen ladies in such "full dress" for a house dinner. Most of the ladies were in fuller dress than I had ever seen before "off the stage," and I hardly knew what to do about it. "I was kind of ashamed." But everything is in custom. It is all one when you get used to a thing. About midnight the host, rather an elderly gentleman, excused himself and retired. I also started off with him, and, when I asked the breakfast hour, was told not to permit myself to be disturbed in the morning, but to breakfast when I liked, my host adding: "I think it very bad manners, y' know, to disturb a guest in the mornings." However, I was in time to join the gentleman and his eldest daughter at breakfast about 9:30.

During my visit there was a formal, and sometimes rather large, dining party each evening, and the dinner itself was always of a thoroughly good but routine sort. All English dinners are much alike, always of a thoroughly good, but always a bit heavy. Give the four seasons of the year, any one always knows what one is going to have when invited out to dinner. I have been to four dinner parties in the week, and had pretty nearly the same dinner each time. Were it not a good dinner, and always perfectly served, one would get very tired of it. Speaking of dinner companies, I was immensely amused one evening when, coming in from a drive, I said to the butler: "Head, who is to be at dinner this evening?" when, with exceeding pomposity, Head replied: "Nobody of importance, sir." However there were two officers of the army at dinner, and they thought no doubt, they were of considerable importance. However, butlers in great families in England are themselves most important personages, and disdain to consider untitled people of any consequence, except they be foreigners, which happened to be my claim to consideration.

Each day was planned and arranged for. The saddle horses were at the service of the guests till or after luncheon, and the carriages for such as chose to drive. One was left to one's self for the entire day, unless one chose to join a riding or driving party. The whole house—dining room, library and private room—was at one's use for the day, the drawing room and billiard room for the evening.

Customs differ in different families as to the precise way and order of keeping Christmas eve and Christmas day. In this family on Christmas eve there was the Christmas tree—rather a German than an English custom. Some one or two members of the family—perhaps the two eldest daughters—decorate the tree and hang it with the various presents for the different members of the family, servants and the guests. It is not considered good "form" for the guests to give presents, to the hosts and family at this time, but perhaps to send a remembrance in some simple way afterward. There was the oyster supper after the dinner, and about 10 o'clock we were all taken into a large sitting or living room, where the servants were already gathered—just 19 in number—and where the tree, about 15 feet high, was all a blaze of light and color. The presents were mostly of a very simple and rather inexpensive kind, consisting of pretty editions of books, albums for family and guests, and articles of wearing apparel and fineries for the servants. Each article was marked with the name of the person for whom intended and by whom given.

On Christmas morning the family assembled for prayers, and the guests on this occasion joined the family, and afterward all drove or walked to the parish church for service at 11 o'clock. It is expected on such festivals that the lord of the manor and his family will be present at divine worship. So the days and the weeks passed all too quickly. I have often since been in country houses, and have been the guest of great town houses, but I have told you the story of a Christmas time in a family now broken up and scattered, My host has joined the great majority. I have one less friend on this side, and one more precious one that side.

Views of the Pope.

From an interview with the Archbishop Gibbons: "Did it strike you that the Holy Father was perfectly alive to the wants of American Catholics?"

"Well, perhaps not quite so as to details. But since our arrival, as some of us have had three and even four audiences with him, he can hardly have failed to learn a great deal. The holy father is a man of rare and high intelligence, grand and wide-reaching views, and great literary attainments: He himself is the writer of nearly all those admirable encyclicals which have been issued of late years. For the rest you may judge of the character of the holy father from a remark he once made to me: 'I am desirous,' said he, 'of appealing in all things to the good sense and reason of the public.'

"He is a hard worker. Too often he begins to give audiences at 8 o'clock in the morning, and continues with scarcely any intermission for meals till 8 or 9 in the evening. The holy father's audiences are never perfunctory. He does everything thoroughly, and gives Catholics and non-Catholics like attention. Perhaps he is a little more courteous to Protestants than to Catholics. No; I never had occasion to discuss the 'Roman question' with him. In our conversations he naturally confined himself to American subjects."

"Have you ever detected any anti-Irish feelings in the holy father's conversation?"

"Never. He loves Ireland, and, indeed, ought to love her, for no other nation is more true to the church."

The Printers' "Thirty."

The printers of a newspaper office have a significant term for nearly everything connected with their trade. They speak to an extent in a language common to themselves; and the novice or the apprentice has first to learn the language of the printers, and next the language of the types. Among the words peculiar to the craft the word "thirty" is perhaps most often used and possessed of the most meaning. "Thirty" is the end. It is what "finis" is to a book or death to an individual. When "thirty" is reached the weary compositor drops his stick The day's work is done. How the term originated nobody seems to know, but from the printer it has fallen to the editor and become a portion of the education of the telegraph operator who handles press reports. The last page of "copy" from the editor-in-chief bears the "thirty," which indicates that the thoughts concerning the news of the day have been presented as fully as may be; the last proof from the proof reader tells the story in the appended "thirty" that his day's work is done; the "thirty" from the city editor denotes the completion of the record of the city's daily life, and the "thirty" on the manifold paper received from the telegraph operator conveys the information that the story of its waking hours is finished.—[Omaha Republican.

Mechanics Becoming the Masters.

Boston Commercial Bulletin.

Each ensuing day make more prominent the fact that we have come upon the time when the mechanic is master. We have crowded professions and ill-filled trades. A chance to fill the position of sub-assistant clerk in a wholesale house is eagerly grasped at by a hundred applicants, though the wages received be scarcely more than a chance to learn the business. Let a master workman try to obtain an apprentice at three times the salary offered the clerk and his applicants will be poor alike in quantity and quality. A skilled workman in any trade need never want for hire; he is eagerly sought after by hundreds of employers; he is independent of the condition of the market; the skill and cunning of his hand and eye are too valuable to lose, and must be paid whether the products are slowly or rapidly consumed. If business ceases, the master-hand is eagerly seized by some rival house, which knows and values the product of his skill. He who would crush down the obstacles to success in our days must have, as well as the wit to see the crevice, the strength to deal the blow. This is an age of the steam engine, and it is the engineer, not the conductor, who is master.

Miscellaneous Matters.

The head of a large manufacturing establishment, which pays its men weekly, says men thus paid are better satisfied, their credit at stores is better, and they are able to make their money go further in supplying their families with the necessities of life than those are whose wages are given to them only a dozen times a year.

There were 58,760 patients in the lunatic asylums of France last year, of whom about 27,000 were men and 31,000 women, showing that females are the most liable to insanity. That they are less influenced by treatment is shown by the fact that the average duration of treatment for men is 276 days, while for women it is 295 days.

The oldest and largest match factory in the world is at Jonkoping, in Sweden. It was established one hundred years ago, and there are now to be seen specimens of the matches used at the beginning of the present century, consisting of big faggots of wood furnished with a handle and a tip to dip in a bath of sulphur.

Australia begs for more colonists though it is receiving nearly 40,000 a year, and advertisements for laborers often present such inducements as these: "Healthful climate, good shooting, and free schools."

A Meriweather (Ga.) farmer discovered one of his mules feeding upon his geese. The flock had been diminishing mysteriously, and the loss had been attributed to foxes. One night recently, hearing a disturbance among his geese in the horse lot, he seized his gun and rushed to the lot to investigate the cause of the commotion. Getting as close as caution allowed, he fired in the direction of the noise made by the struggling goose. At the report of the gun his ears were greeted with a most terrific squalling from one of the mules. A light being produced it was discovered that the mule had received a part of the load in his nose. It was the mule that had been eating the geese.

Chinamen in this country, and especially in the west, have been quick to see the increased value of their services, caused by the enforcement of the restriction act. Soon after its passage the Chinese laborers in California demanded and received at least a third more in weekly wages, and now many of them are agitating for another increase. In the Sandwitch Islands Chinamen are noted for their propensity for strikes.

If drugs were thrown to dogs—and dogs were fresh enough to take them—it would be greatly to the advantage of humanity and the sheep business. And there is more occasion for this reform with us than anywhere else under the sun—as appears from the Siglo Medico's own statistics of the percentage of doctors to population of different countries; France has 2.91 per 10,000 people; Germany, 3.21; Austria, 3.41; England, 6; Hungary, 6.10; Italy, 6.10; Switzerland, 7.6; United States, 16.24. Happily, however, we are not restricted for cemetery room, and cremationism is on the increase.

The Celestial Empire has long been a favorite field for missionaries of the Roman Church, which has established itself in considerable force throughout the country, as well as at Pekin. There are no fewer than twenty-five bishops and apostolic vicars in China. About half of these are French priests, two of them being Jesuits, two of the order of St. Lazare, and the rest mostly appertaining to the Missionary Society of the Rue du Bac. The Lazarites have a large and important establishment in Pekin, close to the Imperial Palace. It is a convent, originally given to the Jesuits by the Emperor Kandy, but is now governed by Mgr. Delaplace, Bishop of Pekin, who has been for thirty-five years a missionary in China. It is noticed as a peculiarity of this convent that every one admitted to it is required to swear solemnly that he will not connive at Chinese rites, which it was once sought to combine with the Roman Catholic worship, but were proscribed by a bull of Pope Benedict XIV.

The Duke of Portland.

His Grace William John Cavendish Scott-Bentinck, fifth Duke of Portland, was certainly no ordinary nobleman. History might be searched in vain for another such patrician. He stands alone in the solitude of his own odd isolated originality. His character was a study. Why did he build underground? It was not for want of space above. The Bentincks own 153,163 English acres, besides London estates. He built magnificent stables and superb riding schools, but he never strode a horse. He built a ball-room which is almost without a rival, but he never danced. He erected skating rinks, but he never skated. He found employment for vast numbers, yet he could not have been respected, for the workmen felt that their labor was being thrown away. He was called the "Invisible Prince" because of the air of mystery with which he clothed himself. A member of the four leading London clubs, he never entered their portals. His shooting and hunting parties were unsurpassed, but he never saw his invited guests. He cultivated flowers and fruit, whose fragrance and flavor never ministered to his enjoyment. He bred trout by the forty thousand a year, yet he was not an angler. A great farmer, agriculture attracted him not. "Can't you let it alone?" was Lord Palmerston's advice to a perfervid politician. "Can't you leave me alone?" was the lifelong aspiration of the Hermit of Welbeck the Wonderful. He lived to his eightieth year. There is an expressive marble bust of him in the underground picture gallery. It is a kindly, shrewd, noble, and intelligent face. In the head a Lavater would see "constructiveness" writ large. The recluse loved to be hidden from the sight of men; he is now out of human gaze forever. Inquisitive sightseers may regard with wondering eyes the monuments of his unaccountable taste, but the builder himself they never beheld. "Eccentricity" was the good-natured description assigned to the strange anfractuosities of the departed duke's nature. He wanted to escape from the eye of the world, and by his efforts to elude notice he was always being brought into prominence.—London Society.

A perusal of Gov. Murray's message caused an aged mormon to hang himself.

1883 1884.

Let us drink to the year that is dying fast
Though his days were weary and long;
Let us sing for the year that has come at last,
Let us welcome him in with a song!
Let us speed with a song the sad old year,
With the trouble he brought in his train;
Let us greet with a toast the one that is near—
We had hoped: Let us hope again!

The snow that glistens on briar and thorn
Like a sheet o'er the landscape lies,
Like swaddling clothes for the year that is born,
Or a shroud for the year that dies;
And the night winds wail through the leafless tree,
And the blazing yule-logs' roar
Sounds the funeral anthem of Eighty-three,
And a prelude for Eighty-four.

Familiar faces make way for the strange,
And the old gives place to the new,
But faith in the future is firm through change
As dreams of the past are true,
Then a toast for the year that is coming fast,
May his days be merry and long!
And a dirge for the year that is gone at last—
We will speed him home with a song.

Hot-Water Cure.

Years ago, the grandmothers of the present generation used to cure their children of colic by making them drink warm herb tea and applying hot draughts to their feet. Croup was relieved by dipping strips of flannel in in hot water, wringing them out, and then enveloping the child's neck with them. This old-fashioned method of using hot water as a remedy has again become fashionable, and is spoken of as something new.

Hall's Journal of Health points out the diseases in which the old remedy will do good, and those wherein it may do harm.

Take, for example, the case of a person who has taken cold in the lungs.

The circulation of the blood in the small blood-vessels in that portion of the lungs affected becomes sluggish; in some uses it is quite suspended; the general circulation is impeded through failure of an important organ to do the work required of it, and the whole system suffers; the man is ill.

Now, if we know why the disease exists, by what unnatural condition it is kept up, the remedy suggests itself; as, if a water-pipe were frozen up, any child knows that the remedy is heat.

And here is just where water as warm as it can be comfortably borne will effect a cure in ordinary cases.

Let the patient go to bed. Put bottles of hot water to his feet, and cloths wet in hot water on his chest. Let him drink hot water as freely as he can with comfort; it matters little whether it is clear hot water, or herb tea, it is nevertheless hot water.

With this treatment we are employing hot water at its full value.

Its internal use tends to thaw out the blood-vessels, and its outward application quickens the circulation in the blood-vessels near the surface; thus drawing on the deep-seated blood-vessels for supplies to keep up the activity, and thus the conjestion is relieved and the patient cured.

In dyspepsia, hot water taken internally, under proper restrictions, is no doubt useful, since dyspepsia depends on a congested and deranged condition of the digestive organs.

But in consumption and other diseases attended by general debility it can only be detrimental.

When a person is feeble from disease not marked with acute inflammation, the hot-water treatment necessarily increases the debility.

Here a tonic treatment is applicable—a treatment that will increase and enrich the blood and supply the fuel required to keep the machinery of life in motion.

The hot-water treatment is useful in removing obstructions from the machinery, but only in systems where there is a surplus of vital power.

To recapitulate: The drinking of hot water at proper intervals and in proper quantities is useful in dyspepsia, constipation, torpid liver, congestion of the stomach, chronic diarrhoea, and in various affections of the kidneys and bladder; provided that there are not at the same time serious diseases of the lungs, with debility.

The water should be as hot as tea is usually made, that is, from 110 deg. to 150, deg, and should be sipped, not taken rapidly. The quantity should be from half a pint to a pint.

It should be taken one to two hours after meals, and nothing should be eaten until at least one hour after-ward. The evening draught should be just before going to bed.

The hot-water treatment should continue until a cure is effected; the time required will vary from one to six months.

Earthquake Weather.

Anybody who has ever lived for any length of time at a stretch in a region where earthquakes are common objects of the country and the seaside knows perfectly well what earthquake weather in the colloquial sense is really like. You are sitting in the piazza, about afternoon tea-time let us say, and talking about nothing in particular with the usual sickly tropical languor, when gradually a sort of faintness comes over the air, the sky begins to assume a lurid look, the street dogs leave off howling hideously in concert for half a minute, and even the grim vultures perched upon the the housetops forget their obtrusive personal differences in a common sense of general uneasiness. There is an ominous hush in the conversation for a few seconds, and then somebody says with a yawn, "It feels to me very much like earthquake weather." Next minute you notice the piazza gently raised from its under-dropping wood-work by some unseen power, observe the teapot quietly deposited in the hostess' lap, and are conscious of a rapid but graceful oscillating movement, as though the ship of state were pitching bodily and quickly in a long Atlantic swell. Almost before you have had time to feel surprised at the suddenness of the interruption (for the earth never stops to apologize) it is all over; and you pick up the the teapot with a smile, continuing the conversation with the greatest attainable politeness, as if nothing at all unusual had happened meanwhile. With earthquakes, as with most other things and persons, familiarity breeds contempt. It is wonderful, indeed, how very quickly and easily one gets accustomed at last to these little mundane accidents. At first, when you make your earliest acquaintance with an earthquake country, there is something unspeakably appalling and awesome in the sense of utter helplessness which you feel before the contemplation of a good shivering earthquake. It isn't so much that the thing in itself is so very alarming—nine earthquakes out of ten in any given place do nothing worse than bring a bit of plaster ceiling, or wade you up with a sound shaking in your bed at night, it is the consciousness that the one seemingly stable and immovable element in one's whole previous personal experience, the solid earth that we are accustomed to contrast so favorably with stormy seas and fitful reezes, has at last played us false, and failed visibly beneath our very feet.—The Cornhill Magazine.

Mr. Kalloch, ex-preacher, returning to San Francisco the other day, lectured in his old "temple." His audience consisted of a baker's dozen. His popularity is gone, and he finds himself, with Kearney, on the shelf.

Colonel J. N. One of the most curious suits ever recorded was recently instituted by Mr. Kreglo, of Indianapolis, against Charles Graham. Years ago Graham had a leg amputated, and it seems that Kreglo, who is an undertaker, has kept it in his vault since. The other day he began suit for vaultage, the account reading thus: "To vaultage on a limb of Charles Graham for one hundred and sixty-eight months, at $3 a month, $504."

The laws of Maryland still make a minister of the gospel illegible as a legislator. A Rev. Mr. Hudson was recently elected to a seat in the legislature but was met with the constitutional objection. He pleaded that he was no longer a minister, having quit preaching. But it was of no use; once a preacher, always a preacher—in Maryland.

Mr. S. S. Cox will soon begin work upon a book to be published by a publishing house at Norwich, Conn., which he has contracted to finish by July, and for which he is to be paid about $75,000. It is to be a political history of the country from the time of Buchanan's administration, and the publication, it is expected, will in a measure serve as a contrast of political views with the forthcoming work by Mr. Blaine covering the same period.

Seeing After Ten Years.

New York Times.

The Rev. Backus, of Union College, has had his sight restored after ten years' blindness by cataract. The Shenectady Union says: "Dr. Backus' joy on returning to his family, able to see their faces for the first time in ten years, can not be described. Many whose voices were perfectly familiar to him were in their faces entire strangers. He had never seen his grandchildren. Some friends had changed and grown old in ten years, and but for their familiar voices would scarcely have been recognized. In the city the changes have been as great. The Young Men's Christian Association, of which Dr. Backus had been an influential member for many years, had built a large and handsome structure on State street, and he had passed it every day for years, but never saw it until last week. So throughout the city the doctor is almost a stranger, and each day finds some improvement over ten years ago. In answer to the question as to how his spirits were affected at the thought of being blind, Dr. Backus said that when in perfect health the appalling sense of his loss rarely occurred to him."

Circulation of the Air.

Without the atmospheric ocean in which our globe is immersed, our world would be as dead as the moon. Yet into it are continually pouring carbonic acid from billions on billions of human and bestial lungs, still more hurtful effluvia from as many bodies, miasma and malaria from thousands of miles of decaying vegetable matter, the poisons of disease and pestilence the world over and the gases given off by the decomposing dead of man and brute.

So vast is this ocean, and so rapidly does it take up and scatter these noxious elements through its measureless masses, and so much of them is appropriated as food by the vegetable world, that the air as a whole may be regarded as practically pure. This result is due, in main, to the circulation of the air. mighty elevated currents of which flow from the heated tropics toward the north; while counter currents from the Arctic regions flow beneath to fill the vacuum. Besides these, are every variety of local currents, from sea to land and from land to sea, and between colder and warmer areas. Without this circulation, the air of our cities and towns especially would be loaded with poison.

But every house is a little world, with its air in perpetual circulation, between the warmer and the colder parts, the inside and outside, the cellar and attic, the bed-room, the parlor and kitchen. Closed doors do not prevent this circulation.

Hence the need of a thorough system of ventilation. Variations in the atmospheric pressure cause even the miasma in the soil for a large distance around the house to be drawn or driven into the cellar, thence to be diffused into the rooms generally. The vitiated air of sleeping-rooms and water-closets carried into the halls and there chilled, may sink into the halls and rooms below.

In tenement houses, houses with "flats," and in "family hotels," without adequate ventilation, each family is at the mercy of every other for purity of air.—Youth's Companion.

Sumner's First Meeting With Greeley.

The following amusing account of Charles Sumner's first meeting with Greeley, never before published, is given in the current number of Every Other Saturday:

Charles Sumner, many years before he was known in politics, sought the acquaintance of Horace Greeley in New York. He found the journalist much engaged, and was invited by him to come to his house the next morning and take breakfast. Mr. Sumner was not an early riser, and he liked a good breakfast when he did get up. He rather anticipated one in this case. At the early hour named by Mr. Greeley, he left the Astor House, took a stage and rode several miles up Broadway, and after much difficulty found the residence of his new friend at an old-fashioned farmhouse, situated in the middle of an orchard between Broadway and the river, where he was hospitably received by the occupant. After considerable conversation with Mr. Greeley, the latter remarked to his wife, who had come into the room, that Mr. Sumner would probably like something to eat, She expressed a doubt whether there was anything in the house, at which Sumner, who was really hungry after his long ride, was somewhat—well, surprised, to say the least. "Why, mother," said Greeley to his wife, "you must have some milk, some bread and milk in the house." She thought that it might be so, and soon appeared with a mug, two bowls and some crackers, which she placed on a bare pine table, and the two incipient philanthropists ate their breakfast in peace. Anybody who knew Sumner and his dainty ways in those things can appreciate the situation. No doubt it was the first and last time he ever did justice to bread and milk. The friend to whom Sumner related this incident had a feeling, which time rather strengthened, that the older philosopher was practising a grim joke on the gay and somewhat festive young man from Boston. Sumner, however, never could appreciate a joke, and considered the transaction a real one so far as good faith was concerned, although he related it with considerable glee. Perhaps he had in his heart something of the Thackeray, who once said to a friend in Boston, "I often wish I knew whether Becky Sharp was really guilty when found by her husband with the Marquis of Steyne under such remarkable circumstances."

England's Rigid Marriage Laws.

From the Toronto Mail.

It is sometimes stated, particularly in papers in the states, that the rigid marriage laws of England cause much unnecessary suffering. They may produce individual cases of unhappiness that are more conducive of benefit in the aggregate than the loose code across the line. There is a case in point. Mr. Weldon separated from his wife on the grounds of incompatibility of temper. He allowed her $1,500 a year, a furnished house, and servants for her separate maintenance; but this did not satisfy Mrs. Weldon. She wanted her husband, and applied to the courts to have him compelled to live with her. The courts decided in her favor, and held that he must maintain the marriage relation or go to prison. Mr. Weldon appears to be a man of peace, and it seems hard that he should be compelled to live with a turbulent woman. But this very hardship will impress all England with the solemnity and importance of the marriage contract. No one will be likely to enter this relation lightly with the case of poor Weldon before his eyes. Where there is no outlet to a passage a man hesitates about entering it; but in the states there are so many facilities for divorce, marriage, instead of being a solemn and binding contract, is regarded more lightly than a trivial business partnership.

A Temperance Man.

A gentleman took the pledge the other day, but somehow his abstinence from the moderate quantity of wine he was accustomed to drink did not agree with him. His doctor was sent for, who recommended a slight alcoholic stimulant. This advice was received with horror "How can I," said the sick man, "Violate my vow? I have forbidden my servants the beer which they love so well, and I am going to preside at a Blue Ribbon meeting next week." "All I can say," said the doctor, "is that a stimulant is necessary for your health. You had better get a bottle of whisky and hide it away, and when your shaving-water comes up just mix yourself a tumbler of whisky and water." The doctor departed, and, meeting his patient's servant a week afterward, he asked him how his master was going on. "Oh, very well as to bodily health," was the reply; "but, between you and me, Sir, I think he has gone wrong in the head—he has taken to shaving himself six times a day!"—Temple Bar.

"Sing a Song of Sixpence."

You all know this rhyme, but have you ever read what it is meant for? The four-and-twenty blackbirds represent twenty-four hours. The bottom of the pie is the world, while the top crust is the sky that over-arches it. The opening of the pie is the day dawn, when the birds began to sing, and surely such a sight is fit for a king. The king, who is represented as sitting in his parlor, counting out his money, is the sun, while the gold pieces that slip through his fingers as he counts are the golden sunshine. The queen, who sits in the dark kitchen, is the moon, and the honey, with which she regales herself, is the moonlight. The industrious maid, who is in the garden at work before her king—the sun—is risen, is day dawn, and the clothes she hangs out are the clouds, while the bird, who so tragically ends the song by "nipping off her nose," is the hour of sunset. So we have the whole day, if not in a nutshell, in a pie.

Addison once wrote: "Laziness grows on people. It begins in cobwebs and ends in iron chains. The more business a man has to do the more he is able to accomplish, for he learns to economize his time.

F. W. Thubber, who retired from business in New York, is estimated to be worth $2,000,000. He began with a few dollars, and gradually built up a colossal grocery concern. His age is fifty-four.

SLEEP SONG.

Hush the homeless baby's crying,
Tender Sleep!
Every folded violet
May the outer storm forget;
Those wet lids with kisses drying,
Through them creep!

Soothe the soul that lies thought-weary,
Murmurous Sleep!
Like a hidden brooklet's song,
Rippling gorgeous woods among,
Tinkling down the mountains dreary,
White and steep.

Breathe thy balm upon the lonely,
Gentle Sleep!
As the twilight breezes bless
With sweet scents the wilderness,
Ah, let warm white dove-wings only
Round them sweep!

O'er the aged pour thy blessing,
Holy Sleep!
Like a soft and ripening rain
Falling on the yellow grain,
For the glare of suns oppressing,
Pitying weep!

O'er thy still seas met together
Charmed Sleep!
Hear them swell a drowsy hymning,
Swans to silvery music swimming,
Floating with unruffled feather
O'er the deep!

ANECDOTES OF THE WAR.

Interesting Recollections of Scott, Lee, Lincoln and Stanton.

From the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

Ex-Adjutant Gen. E. D. Townsend now on the retired list, was one of the most active and trusted officers at Washington during the war. His position placed him in almost daily contact with the president, the general-in-chief, when in Washington, and the secretary of war, and he saw how the rulers of the country labored with weighty problems before reaching official decisions. His new book, "Anecdotes of the Civil War in the United States," just published by D. Appleton & Co., has many historical as well as entertaining qualities. The general writes these recollections in a quiet, pleasant vein, and with evident close attention to facts. The book is not made up of scrappy anecdotes, but is rather a recital of important state proceedings and events in Washington, with incidents attending them. It is hardly necessary to say that Gen. Townsend does not violate any confidences. He has many interesting things to say of Buchanan, Lincoln, Scott, McClellan, Halleck, Stanton and scores of others prominent in the war.

In the fall of 1860 he was one of a party of twelve or fourteen who dined with President Buchanan at the Soldiers' Home. Conversation turned on the probable secession of the Southern States. Mr. Buchanan said little until Massachusetts was mentioned, when he remarked, with considerable warmth: "I wish Massachusetts would secede; she is practically already out of the Union by her action in the fugitive slave matter." Gen. Townsend does not give much space to Buchanan, though acknowledging his kindly social impulses. The unflinching loyalty and high-minded patriotism of Gen. Winfield Scott were perfectly well known to Gen. Townsend who was on Scott's staff until the venerable soldier was succeeded by McClellan. Gen. Townsend was present when Col. Robt. E. Lee had his final interview with Scott, April 19, 1861. Scott had written to Lee that he wished to see him. When Lee came in (writes Townsend), I was alone in the room with Gen. Scott, and the door to the aides' room was close. I quietly arose, keeping my eye on the general, for it seemed probable he might wish to be alone with Lee. He, however, secretly montioned me to keep my seat, and I sat down without Lee having a chance to notice that I had rizen. The General having invited Lee to be seated, the following conversation, as nearly as I can remember, took place:

Gen. Scott. You are at present on leave of absence, Col. Lee?

Col. Lee. Yes, General, I am staying with my family at Arlington.

Gen. Scott. These are times when every officer in the United States should fully determine what course he will pursue, and frankly declare it. No one should continue in Government employ without being actively engaged. [No response from Lee.]

Gen. Scott [seeing evidently that Lee showed no disposition to declare himself loyal, or even in doubt]. I suppose you will go with the rest. If you purpose to resign, it is proper you should do so at once; your present attitude is an equivocal one.

Col. Lee. General, the property be-onging to my children, all they possess, es in Virginia. They will be ruined if ey do not go with their State. I can ot raise my hand against my children.

Gen. Scott then signified that he had othing further to say, and Col. Lee ithdrew. The next day, April 20, 1861, tendered his resignation, and it was cepted the 25th. Gen. Scott made no mark upon the subject, but he was idently much grieved at thus parting h a man of whom he had been just- proud, and for whom he had rished the highest personal regard. as probably near the same day as interview with Gen. Scott, that the owing incident, related to me by the Col. Shiras, occurred. Shiras was e office of Adjt. Gen. L. Thomas n Col. Lee came in there. Standing e side of the table opposite where nas was sitting, Lee said: "Gen. as, I am told you have said I was itor." Thomas arose and looking n the eye, replied: "I have said o you wish to know on what au- ty?" "Yes," said Lee. "Well, on uthority of Gen. Scott!" Lee mut- "There must be some mistake," eft the room.

. Townsend saw much of Mr. ln, and gives a number of the ed stories used as illustrations e war President. "An old friend r. Lincoln was conversing with the dent at a time during the war things looked very dark. On his leave he asked the President e should say to their friends in cky what cheering news he could im. Mr. Lincoln replied: "That ds me of a man who prided him- reatly on his game of chess, hav- eldom been beaten. He heard of chine called the automaton chess- r, which was beating every one played against it. So he went to s skill with the machine. He lost rst game, so with the second and ird. Then rising in astonishment his seat, he walked around the ine, and looked at it a few minutes. stopping and pointing at it he ex- ed. "There is a man in there." oy friends," said Mr. Lincoln, ng himself up to his full height, e is a man in there."

. Townsend's reminiscences of aty Stanton are quite extended. following are quotations: "Mr. entered upon the duties of ry of War with a due appreciation difficulties and responsibilities. beset by persons who had 'axes d,' and some of them were not ous as to the means of gaining d. He found that a determined uld often alone enable him to nt obstacles in the way of the ervice. This, added to the nervability which infallibly attends k, sometimes made him arbitoffensive in his manners. But I always found him ready to make amends when in the wrong—if not directly by apology, yet by some exceedingly kind act which more than atoned for his hasty words. He confirmed this impression when about to take final leave of the War Department by saying to me that the only regret he felt in severing official relations with the officers who, under his administration of the War Department, had so faithfully and intelligently served the country, was that sometimes when racked in body and mind he had not been able to control himself, and had addressed language to them which he afterwards regretted. Indeed, he had often reminded me of the man who had had a hard time in his domestic circle, where he was forced to restrain himself, but, finding some one tying his shoe-string on the door-step, he vented his pent-up passion by knocking him over, saying, 'you are always tying your shoe.' This thought often enabled me to refrain from a sharp answer, when it would have done more harm than good. Yet I did not always take an unmerited rebuke quietly. He sent down for me one day to go to his room in the department. I found him alone, pacing the floor. He asked me rather sternly why I had done a certain thing that had just come to his knowledge. I gave him my reasons. Said he: 'You were wrong; you ought not to have done any such thing.' As I differed from him I made no sort of reply. Then he asked me why I had not done something else instead. I told him why, briefly explaining the circumstances. He said in a milder tone, that he did not agree with me. To this I made no reply. Then he asked, 'Don't you think you were wrong?' I said, very deliberately and positively: 'No, Mr. Secretary, I do not think I was wrong, and moreover, I may as well add, once for all, that my best judgment and ability were uniformly exerted to foresee what may require to be done, and to do it as well as possible. If I fail, it is not from want of endeavor; and when you find fault, as you sometimes do, it cannot quicken me to greater care and exertion, but only makes me indifferent whether I please you or not.' He said quietly, 'I rebuke whom I please.' 'Yes sir,' said I. Having waited some time, and finding he said nothing more, but continued walking up and down in deep thought: I asked him if he wished anything further. He said: 'No,' and I withdrew. Half an hour after the messenger summoned me to his room again. I thought it quite probable he would do as he did with a former chief of a bureau who got angry at the way Mr. Stanton spoke to him, and resented it by saying he would not allow any man to address to him such language. It was at the beginning of his administration, and the Secretary asserted his authority by ordering the refractory chief to a remote city and never afterward allowing him to return to duty. But I had taken my stand deliberately and meant to maintain it. The secretary was still alone and standing by his high table. Beckoning to me with his finger in a pleasant way, he put his arm around my shoulder and drew my head close to his, when he whispered to me a very important secret, which it was not at all necessary I should know. He had weighed all I had said, found I was right and took this method of showing me extraordinary confidence by way of acknowledgment. This course which the secretary pursued more than once, fully accomplished his generous purpose without subjecting him to a direct confession of wrong, which he thought might weaken his influence. He knew that I well understood so. In moments of leisure he would often send for me, and in the most pleasant manner inquire about my business, to inform himself of what was going on, and then converse generally on topics requiring consideration. In this way he maintained a sufficient knowledge of things he might have to act upon, and broke in upon the headlong current of events which seemed to cause everything to be done in a hurry.

"The absurd and malicious tale that Stanton took his own life was forever refuted by the letter of Surgeon Gen. Barnes and affidavits of Wm. S. Dupee was and David Jones. If anything more wanting to confirm me in the persuasion of the falsity of such a story, my own knowledge would suffice. I watched by the body of Edward M. Stanton the entire night after his death, and could not have failed to know if there was anything wrong about it. Moreover I could never be brought to believe that a man who so often gave utterances to religious convictions as he did in friendly conversations with me could have possibly perverted his mind so as to commit such a deed. Only some three or four years preceding his decease, he invited General Barnes and Meigs and myself to be present at his baptism. The ceremony was performed in his chamber by the Rev. Dr. Sparrow, his old time professor at Kenyon College, none others, except his family, being present.

She Could Keep a Secret.

"We're bound to be equal to you men," said the Mason's wife; "we formed a secret society of our own last night." "Indeed," said the worshipful master, composedly; "then I hope, my dear, your project will be successful. Is it a benevolent society, or what?" "That's none of your business. It's a secret society, and we've swern by solemn oath not to divulge anything relating to it." "Very good, my dear," observed the worshipful master, returning to his paper; "I'm sure I do not wish you to violate your oath." "It wouldn't matter if you did, I wouldn't. You keep your secrets close enough—and to think of that stupid Mrs. Furbelow! she could recollect neither the grip nor the sign. It took us an hour to teach her. When I gave her the sign, like this (suits the action to the word), she would make it in this way, ha! ha! Her stupidity would have been exasperating if it hadn't been ridiculous, and as for learning the grip, why, she would have it that it was this way—give me your hand a minute—there, she would have it that way while it was this way; and the pass word! she couldn't keep it in her memory two minutes. Over and over again I told her it was 'Be just and fear not,' and she would have it, 'Swear not at all,' or 'Do unto others as you would be done by,' ha! ha! we almost despaired of getting it through her head. But we made her understand at last. Oh, yes! we are going to have a flourishing society, and we can be as secret about it as you men are about yours."

Then the lady went off to attend to her household duties, and the worshipful master hid his face behind his paper and smiled.—Somerville Journal.

The English and the French Parvenu.

Give 50,000 francs to a Frenchman and he will place them in the funds and retire from active life. Give the same sum to an Englishman and he will either spend it in a month or go to the colonies and turn farmer. It is all or nothing with him. Fifty thousand francs! In English money that makes but £2000. What a meagre sum! How small it sounds to the ear of an Englishman! In landed property alone the Duke of Devonshire has a fortune which amounts to about £8,000,000, which means 200,000,000 francs. He is one of the richest of the peers of England, but there are many richer than he. The Duke of Westminister, for instance, whose fortune is something incredible. The word nobleman in English is almost synonomous with rich men. This is the secret of the prestige enjoyed by the aristocracy. The day on which the aristocracy have the right to dispose, according to their pleasure, of the property which now increases day by day on account of the law of primogeniureship, they will cease be to a political power; they will become just what their French brethren are—a group of prejudiced men. The English parvenu is still more objectionable than his like in France, because he is not, as the latter has, a certain leaven of admiration and respect for knowledge and talent. When he is in good society the Frenchman contents himself with rattling his guiness while the other will tell you without hesitation that he might have turned his hand to poetry or painting, or easily learned Latin and Greek; if he had set himself about it, but that, like a good Briton, he preferred to be useful to his country and go in for business. Barring this, the two types are similar, always excepting this little difference—that the French specimen has invariably arrived in Paris in wooden shoes and with 40 sous in his pocket, whereas this kind of covering for the feet is unknown in England, and the English parvenu always comes up to London with only half a crown about him.

RISEN FROM THE DEAD.

A Well Known St. Louis Official Hears From a Man He Saw Killed Twenty Years Ago.

From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Just twenty years ago to-day the Thirty-seventh Virginia Regiment, under Col. Bob. Claiborne, now Prosecuting Attorney of the St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction, sallied forth from Moorhead, Va., to meet that holy terror of all Confedrates, the celebrated "Stoneman Brigade." Gen. Stoneman was on his famous raid, the object of which was to assail Lee's army in the rear, while the Army of the Potomac attached him in front. He had already met and whipped half-a-dozen bands of rebels, and Col. Claiborne's regiment was the most formidable antagonist he had yet encountered. The engagement was not an important one, and Purvis' "Record of the Rebellion" is the only history of the war which mentions it. But it was remarkable for the daring bravery of two men, who proved themselves the only true soldiers out of a whole company. In the early part of the day Col. Claiborne's regiment was, with the exception of one company, bearing the whole brunt of Stoneman's terrific onslaughts. By three o'clock in the afternoon the fine body of men which that morning formed the Thirty-seventh regiment had been reduced to a mere handful. They had been decimated again and again. One more attack and not a soul would have been left. With the best of their men either killed or wounded, and the balance ready to succumb with fatigue and wounds, there seemed no possibility of escape for any one. But suddenly the missing company appeared on the field, and though, even with the re-enforcements, the fight was hopeless, a shout of relief went up from the wearied and bleeding survivors. There was only one chance for them, and their commander was quick to see it. In a flash he had leaped from his horse, and, calling on the new arrivals, he shouted:

"Every man dismount and follow me!"

But at that moment the blue coats of Stoneman's brigade appeared over the crest of the hill in front, and the cheers of the Union soldiers were ringing in the ears of the confederates. In vain did their colonel try to rally them and urge them on. The solid line of steel in front was too appalling, and almost to a man they broke and fled. A second later and Col. Claiborne found himself deserted by all his men but one. That man was a rough backwoodsman from North Carolina, whom he had, but a short time before, taken from the ranks and promoted to a captaincy for brave and daring conduct on the battle-field. His name was Roberts, and as he pressed close beside his commanding officer he shouted: "I'll stay by you, Colonel, if I lose every drop of blood in my body." The words were hardly out of his mouth before he fell full length on the ground with a rifle-ball through his chest.

The next moment Col. Claiborne was surrounded by the boys in blue and captured. He afterward reported to the Confederate Government the death of Capt. Roberts, and from that day until yesterday, exactly twenty years, he has heard nothing of the man who aided him in his charge on Stoneman's brigade.

Yesterday morning Col. Claiborne, while looking over his letters, came to one with the postmark "Raleigh, N. C.," addressed in lead pencil to Maj. G. R. Claiborne, St. Louis. On opening it the first thing he saw was the name Capt. T. B. Roberts. Jumping to his feet he exclaimed to a bystander: "My God, I have got a letter from the dead. I saw this man shot and killed with my own eyes at the battle of Morehead, Dec. 31, 1863, and here is his writing to me."

The letter, however, explained how Capt. Roberts escaped, and as all the circumstances are so remarkable, it is produced here verbatim:

Raleigh, N. C., Dec. 56.—Maj. Claiborne: I have been trying to find out your address ever since the war; have asked hundreds of people about it, and have only just succeeded. I believe I would rather see you than any other man on God Almighty's earth. Do you remember when you rode up to me at the battle of Orange Court-house? I was only a tarheel soldier before that, but when you done what you did I would have died for you. Then do you remember the fight at Morehead, when you and I started alone to charge Stoneman's brigade? I tell you that fellow Stoneman was the worst cuss in the whole Yankee army for us fellows to tackle. But that d—— company of mine. Wan'ty the the meanest, most cowardly——of——you ever saw? I tell you they were the worst God Almighty ever had a hand in making. No decent man would have run off and left you in the lurch the way they did. If they felt like me they would have died, every d—n mother's son of them, first.

You thought I was dead, didn't you? Well, I am the healthiest dead man in North Carolina. I got an ugly wound in scrimmage at Morehead, and never did know how it all turned out, but long after you had all gone I came to and found a hoss there and managed to get on to him and ride until I found some friends who took care of me and brought me out O. K.

Now, Major, I want you to write me a long letter, and tell me all about yourself and what you are doing. Your true friend, CAPT. T. B. ROBERTS,
Overseer at State Prison, Raleigh, N. C.

Capt. Roberts speaks of Col. Claiborne as Major, because he first knew him before he was made a Colonel. The latter said to a Globe-Democrat reporter yesterday that he should spend most of his time to-day writing to his old comrade.

In India the remarkable sunsets of November created superstitious fear, and numbers of holy men went about preaching impending disaster.

ACROSS THE PLAINS.

The plains were wide and vast and drear,
The mountain peaks seemed cool and near,
The sun hung low toward the west,
"So near," we sighed, "are we to rest."

But journeying through the closing day,
Our feet are weary of the way;
Far, far before our aching sight
The plains lie in the waning light.

The mountain peaks that seemed so near,
And hold our rest forever there,
Are far across the desert lands—
We vainly cry with lifted hands.

O hills, that stand against the sky,
We may not reach you ere we die;
Our hearts are broken with the pain,
For rest and peace we may not gain.

Upon the plains we faint and fall,
Our faces toward the mountain tall:
Our palms are clasped, but not to pray;
So die we with the dying day.

EBENEZER GRATH'S WIFE.

BY "A COUNTRY PARSON."

"Eben Grath, will you come into breakfast; this is the third time I've called you. I believe you are uncommon deaf this morning." Ebenezer was sprinking his potatoes in the patch near the house. The bugs were accomplishing their destroying work, and nothing but the Paris green would discourage them. It was a little old house, innocent of paint, a story and a half with a leaneto, a great brilliant tree overshadowing the roof, and the ground in front sharply descending to the road. It was a sidehill farm facing the east. It would seem a tough tussle with nature to get a living out of this rocky soil, to say nothing of the luxuries of life. Why the very weeds looked stunted and rocks, rocks, abounded everywhere. Even Grath said: "It seemed as if the Almighty left what few He had over in Jordan. It was a mighty hard road to travel anyhow." Although Ebenezer Grath had never vexed his soul about it, he would sit in the doorway with his stump of a pipe, looking off on the meadows and stream that neighbor Jackson owned, hour after hour, wondering "why it was always his frisky luck to be poor." The said Jackson in the mean time was breaking up a piece of muck which he had drained, and was going to plant with strawberries. "Waste of time," Eben said, "fiddlin' round in an old muck hole." But Jackson cleared three hundred dollars the second year by his industry. Eben Grath was "shiftless," there is no better word; good natured but with no gift. He was like the rock down in the east pasture, crumbles, no stability to it. He lacked the fixedness of the granite about him, his backbone needed stiffening, he was spoiled in the making up. He would tramp all day fishing without a murmur, but it made his back ache to dig potatoes. "He kalilated he had no call that way." There were four young Graths. Likely children they were, healthy, well formed and full of vitality. They had managed to live so far on a fifty-acre farm, the last payment on the mortgage just met, and at last out of debt.

Ebenezer Grath had a wife, and that was an important fact to him. She had "faculty," a knack for affairs, an indomitable push. She was a type of a certain class of New England women who seem to belong to no social circle, but make a place for themselves by the very aggressive pluck that will not be daunted. She had a good common-school education; a farmer's daughter, she knew how to work, and liked to. Ebenezer Grath was a good-looking young man with some money and she married him, the only poor-bargain she had ever made, but this was serious enough. The problem of life faced her very soon. She had got to meet it, and with characteristic energy she would not allow fate to scoff her. If you know anything about this strain of blood, you will understand that this woman would not let go her grip on life without a struggle. If she died, she would die in honorable warfare. She never would strike her colors. But what a call it was for patience, heroism, an iron will. To work the farm was one thing, but to make Ebenezer work was quite another. Even her heart failed her almost, but she never let it be known. She had put her hand to the plough of her life, she would not look back. And so she cast about to see what could be done with a scrubby farm for the support of an increasing family. The children came along fast enough, and they brought care, worry and pain; but this woman had an iron constitution. She went to death's door more than once, but she would not die.

One day she went to the village, taking her baby with her. She was quite depressed: Ebenezer grew more shiftless; she was not strong. The interest on the mortgage would soon be due, and where was the money coming from? As old White jogged on she glanced at the agricultural department of the weekly paper. There was something about market gardening and the profit of a little land well cultivated. She read it with a new interest. So occupied was she that a neighbor passed her in his wagon and she knew nothing about its Why could she not do something in this line? Since the coming of summer boarders to the region there was a market for such things. She would think it over. She had been married ten years and the fourth baby sat beside her. It had been ten years of worry and struggle. They had picked berries in summer and braided hats and seated chairs in the winter. They had done anything that would bring in an honest dollar. She had always been interested in chemistry from a school girl. She had a special aptitude in that direction. Agricultural chemistry was somewhat discussed in the papers; she had once heard a lecture in the village on the subject. This woman was quick to catch hints and follow out a line of thought to its practical results. When she broached the subject to Eben, he said, "Blazes, Jane, what won't ye think of; can ye contrive a plan to raise vegetables without work?" "You can't raise them on this farm without brains?" she replied, and fell into a brown study. A day or two after she announced to Eben she had leased for five years five acres of land on the flat grown up to trash. "Haint we got a land enough?" he asked in amazement; "I'll be switched if I don't believe you daft; Jane Grath." "If I be you'll pay the doctor," she replied grimly. That five acres of muck must be cleared, and Ebenezer Grath found he must help if he wanted peace. When Jane had that set to her jaw he knew there was no call to argue, and so, with a neighbor and much grumbling, he set about it. It was a big chore, but Ebenezer Grath's wife was relentless, and it was accomplished. And then she had it drained, borrowing the money to have it done. "What on arth is the use of planting these plaguey things in this swampy hole? I believe you'll bring me to the poor house." "I have kept you out of it for ten years," she said sharply.

She got the land for twenty-five dollars a year, it brought in nothing to its owner before; he was glad enough to realize anything from it. The drain pipes cost her thirty-five dollars. The first year land was broken up and she planted potatoes, and she realized three hundred and fifty bushels. The market was short. She had an extra fine crop, and Ebenezer peddled them out. He was a capital hand at this, he enjoyed it all and was a good salesman. Ebenezer Grath's wife found she had made $250 out of her potato patch. They were about to build a new barn for the hotel down at the village. The soil was a rich loam, and in excavating for the cellar this must be removed. Ebenezer Grath's wife noted this one day and she bought it for a trifle and had it transported to her five acre lot. Then she bought up the ashes in the neighborhood. People said "she was sinking her brains in that slough hole." She was, but it was no fool-hardy undertaking. Her crop of potatoes answered her critics. But this was only the beginning. She began to study agricultural chemistry with new interest, more fertilizers were bought, the neighbors said she was crazy, and the following spring strawberries, cabbages, celery and squashes were growing where two years before low brush covered a muck hole. She had spent the winter evenings in study. She mastered the special care required for each crop. Eben and the two boys with a hired man, were able to do the work; she could have led an army if that had been her duty. The people said it was amazing how much was accomplished getting that land into shape, and putting in the crops. She developed a genius for this business. As the second year drew to a close she knew that success was assured and that ten years of battle was to have its victory at last.

Now this may seem a tame recital, but it was a busy life for her. She arose with the sun and she was the last to retire. It was brains against a sterile farm and a shiftless husband. She developed shrewdness and business capacity. She made a market for herself, and soon acquired a reputation for the quality of her vegetables. She was proving a woman's right to do a man's work. Ebenezer Grath remarked: "It was thunderin' cur'ous how awful quick a woman's brain works; he believed there was more of' em." Now, you may think Jane Grath was a muscular, musculine creature; without that fine-bred bearing which leisure and wealth bring with them; but here you are mistaken. At the opening of our story, she had borne four children, with ten years struggle with proverty and an indolent husband behind her. Better times had just begun to dawn; but Ebenezer Grath's wife was a fine looking woman and she had an air about her and a carriage that many a fashionable woman might envy. A large figure, excellently proportioned, with a head well set on broad shoulders, her sharp gray eye had command of it; and her magnificent hair, tawny as the lioness's skin, was a fitting coronal to so striking a figure. What a pity you say, that this woman should be compelled to burn out her life in such humble work! But soft; was there no display of heroism and poetic action in this life lived near to nature's heart? She had mastered dilemmas and fought disaster and conquered fate, and now, as a steady income was assured, there would be more leisure and the children could have better advantages. Ebenezer Grath had really begun to develop; he could not help it, or he must die of shame. To live with such a woman was a liberal education. He did a man's work, and he looked on Jane with an awed respect.

One of the summer boarders at the hotel was terribly sick, Jane heard of it when she was down to the village. The proprietor was paying his bill for vegetables, strawberries, etc. "We have a verr sick man up stairs, Mrs. Grath, and we can't find out what is the matter. You have experience in sickness, won't oou step up?" She was an excellent nurse. She had the light touch, the keen perception and calm bearing indispensable in a sick room. She went up with the hotel keeper's wife. He had not overstated the fact, the man was terribly sick, delirious, the face red and swollen. Jane Grath was very thoughtful all the way home. There was a pathetic look on her face, and once a tear rolled down her cheek. Fifteen years now she had been married to Eben; she was 36 years old. She thought she had done her duty by him and the children. They were in comfortable circumstances now, the children were getting up out of the way. She was strangely silent when she got home; Eben and the children wondered what had come over mother. Long into the night she sat in the doorway, while the stars hung out their light, and the moon flung its shadows on the valley below. A strange tenderness fell on her face. At last she arose, closed the door and retired. Eben was fast asleep. She looked on his face as on the dead, a moment, and saying "I must do it," fell asleep.

The man at the hotel had small pox and none of them knew it; he would be left to die when they discovered his condition. She knew it at once. When Jane Gray was 18 she was engaged to a merchant she became acquainted with at her aunt's in the city. They were to be married when she was 19, and were going to the West Indies, but her mother was taken sick, it proved her last sickness, and she had to choose between duty and love. Mr. Sinclair was obliged to go at such a time, he pleaded with her to go with him, but the white face of her mother pleaded the stronger. She must obey duty, and he went alone. As she closed the dying eyes of her mother she never regretted her decision, but it was a terrible trial. She loved John Sinclair, and it was like taking her life to let him go. Then she married Ebenezer Grath. Her wanted her, her mother was dead, a stepmother ruled the home and she consented. The sublime passion of love had been stirred once in her soul; this was simply convenience. But she had been a truthful wife to him; you see what she accomplished. The hunger of her soul only spurred her to accomplishment. When she entered the chamber at the hotel she saw the man had small pox. She saw also that it was John Sinclair. Love cannot be deceived; seventeen years make their changes, the flush of delirium could not hide the truth, and she saw her long-lost love, among strangers with a loathsome disease upon him. She had again to choose between love and duty, and you know what such a woman would do.

She had a long talk with Eben, and for once he had nothing to say. There was a look on her face that he dare not question, such as the martyrs might have on the morning of their death. She set her house in order. Her eldest girl although young, but fourteen, was capable, she was like her mother, they must all help. There was a choke in her voice when she bid them good bye, and Eben carried her down. "Jane, you think you are doin' your duty; I don't blame ye, but its mighty tough now on us," and he turned away with a supicious moisture in his eyes. When Jane Grath announced her business and what the matter was with the man, there was a pause at once. Mr. Paine said he must be moved at once. "Moved?" answered Jane Grath, as she came down from the chamber of the office, and her jaw set and her voice rang, "It would be certain death; I will take charge of him; he will not be moved." The boarders all left. An Irish woman was found who had had the disease to assist her. The proprietor and his wife stayed out of shame, and because Jane Grath demanded it. The house was quarantined, the yellow flag flew above it, and then began the fight with death. We say this is not a heroic age. Perhaps not, but this woman in the bloom of womanhood, notwithstanding all her hardships, approaching an easier life, husband and children left behind, was nursing an old lover she had not seen for seventeen years, when to nurse him was to face death. She had let him go from her because duty demanded it, although, it almost broke her heart; she came to him now at a fearful sacrifice because duty demanded it.

Those awful days and nights of pain, that loathsome disease too horrible to describe, delirium that required all their strength to control, fever that burned and stung like scorpions, sinking spells that left but a breath in the body, hour after hour through the hot August days death held high carnival about that couch. Some times Eben or the children would stand out on the street and Jane would open the window for a moment and talk with them, and they would look at her as forever separated from her, and she in another world. But this fight could not last always. John Sinclair had the best of nursing, but his hour had come. The web of his life was soon to be finished. The day the fever turned, he became rational. He recognized Jane, and called for a lawyer. As fortune had it, Esquire Lane had had the disease and came. John Sinclair was a very rich man—a millionaire—but it would not save him now. He left it all to Jane. She protested, but he insisted. "My dear, you have periled your life; you have left your husband and children. Seventeen years ago I chose between money and love, you between love and duty; you shall have your reward." But she thought little of money, in that presence—the mystery of death, the solemn gate-way between two worlds. He died hard. It was terrible; a strong man reduced by disease and with a strong hold on life. All day and until midnight he beat back the angel, and then, with a cry of exultation, he was gone. Jane Grath lay unconscious for hours, oblivious to all outward things.

But she escaped the disease. Her fine constitution and good sense in managing the sick room was her salvation, and she returned home at last, and they received her as from the dead. Eben averred, 'The Almighty saved her for us poor critters, for what could we do without her." But Ebenezer Grath's wife was a rich woman—the rich woman of the region. She had an ample income and a good sense in administering it, which she had learned in years of hardship. She did not lose her balance in her great good fortune. She had the culture and breeding of a gentlewoman, her children were educated by their intercourse with her from day to day, and when they all went abroad for some years of travel, she directed the tour, and Ebenezer declared with good nature that "Jane was a crackin' smart woman; he had no sort of show side of her, he'd allow."

THE IDEAL SOLDIER.

What Induces Bravery on the Battlefield.

Well, what is the need of describing the ideal soldier, seeing that, because of fallen human nature, he is all but an impossibility? But as the marauding "Yank" philosophically remarked to Gen. Sherman.

"You can't expect all the cardinal virtues, uncle, for $13 a month!"

No, but you can get a good many of the simpler martial virtues for less money. There is not much subtlety about the ordinary run of martial virtues. My own belief, founded on some experience of divers of all nationalities in war time, is that most men are naturally cowards. I have the fullest belief in the force of the colonel's retort on his major.

"Colonel," said the major, in a hot fire, "you are afraid; I see you tremble!"

"Yes, sir," replied the colonel, "and if you were as afraid as I am you would run away!"

I do think three out of four men would run away if they dared. There are doubtless some men whom nature has constituted so obtuse as not to know fear, and who, therefore, deserve no credit for their courage; and there are others with nerves so strong as to crush down the rising "funk." The madness of blood does get into men's heads, no doubt. I have the firmest conviction that in cold blood the mass of us would prefer the air quiet rather than whistling with bullets. Most men are like the colonel of the dialogue—they display bravery because in the presence of their comrades and of the danger they are too great cowards to evince poltrooney. Thus the average man made a capital soldier in the old shoulder-to-shoulder days. British yokels, British jail-birds, German handicraftsmen, German bauers, French peasants and French artisans, were all pretty much alike and made creditable "cannon-fodder." They would all march into fire and thole its sting, each man's right and left comrade reacting on him and his rear file supporting at once and blocking him. In the fire the national idiosyncrasies developed themselves. The "funk," zone, so to speak had been traversed and the Briton moved on steadfastly, the German advanced with slower step, the Russian stood still dodgedly, and the Frenchman spurted into a run with a yell. When the blood began to flow and the truck men went down, the passion of the battle became the all absorbing question. And so, whether by greater or less steadfastness, or greater or less dash, the battle was won or lost. Till the culminating point, no man was ever thrown wholly upon his own individuality or ever lost the consciousness of public opinion as represented by his comrades—Archidald Forbes in the Fortnightly Review.

An Immense Vineyard.

From the San Francisco Call.

In the immense vineyard of Governor Stamford at Vina there are, at present, 10,000 acres planted in grapevines of different varieties, the greater portion of which are young, and as yet have not been productive. The old Gerke vineyard, which forms the nucleus, covers a space of seventy-five acres; to this, 1,000 acres of young vines were added in 1882, and 1,500 acres in 1883. They are all very thrifty, and form a beautiful sight when viewed from any direction. The irrigation of this vineyard is, perhaps, the most complete in the world. At regular intervals through the vineyard avenues are cuts which are forty feet in width; through these avenues are run irrigating ditches, with a driveway on each side. The blocks thus formed by the irrigating ditches are about fifty yards wide, but extend a great length, and contain about 100 acres each. In this way the system of irrigation is made complete, and all the land receives an equal proportion of water. Every two of these blocks are planted to a different variety of grapes. The main ditches run east and west across the field, and where the field is uneven intersecting ditches are made. In some cases it has been necessary to construct flumes to carry the water over lower lands. A flume 1,800 feet long has been built to carry water over the alfalfa fields. Besides the 10,000 acres planted in vines, the governor owns 10,000 acres more than he has lately acquired by purchase. He is contemplating, however, extending his vineyard, making new additions to it each year.

SOME COLD DAYS.

When Our Ancestors Probably Got Left.

It is a bit of coincidence that the comet upon which Napoleon's soldiers gazed several years ago, when they were making that dreadful march from Moscow, which resulted in the death from cold and exposure of 400,000 men, should be accompanied on its reappearance, with a bitter cold spell of weather. When it swept out of sight the world witnessed an unusually severe winter. The incident, as well as the present cold snap, recalls other severe winters. In October, 763, and February, 764, the denizens of the cities of mosque and minarets were astonished by a cold spell of weather and the two seas at Constantinople were frozen over for twenty days in 1063 the Thames was frozen over for fourteen weeks. In 1407 the cold was so intense in England that all the small birds perished, and in 1433 the large fowl of the air were driven by the terrible cold into the cities of Germany.

In 1468 the winter was so severe in Flanders that the wine distributed was cut with hatchets.

The year 1658 was noted for cold weather in England. Thousands of forest and shade trees were split by frost, hares and stock perished, a line of stages ran on the Thames for several weeks and shops were built on the ice in the middle of the Thames.

In 1810 the wolves were driven by the cold into Vienna, where they attacked men and cattle on the street.

In 1910 quicksilver froze in the thermometer bulbs at Moscow. One of the most remarkable changes of temperature was witnessed at Hornesy and Hammersmith, near London, in 1867. The thermometer was three degrees below zero on the 4th of January and seventy-two hours later it had leaped to fifty-five degrees above zero.

With respect to America some of the remarkable cold spells were as follows: In 1730, and again in 1821, New York harbor was frozen over so that teams were driven across the ice to Staten Island. The neighboring State of Indiana saw weather cold enugh to congeal the mercury in 1855. The winter of 1881 was made memorable by cold weather. On the 13th and 26th days of January many deaths occurred from the intense cold, and the residents of Mobile saw the thermometer sink to zero.

A record of cold seiges would be imperfect without a mention of the terribly sudden storm that swept over the country in 1863, which has gone into history as the cold New Year's. A drayman was frozen to death in Cincinnati while driving along the street; a man climbing a fence in Minnesota froze to death and toppled over into the snow, while the loss of human and animal lives in all parts of the country was immense.—Cleveland Herald.

The Story of a Leper Girl.

Among the last to come on shore was a half-white girl, the child of a native woman, whose father was a chief of Kaula, by the owner and master of a Yankee whaling barque. When the whaling skipper, becoming rich, retired from business and settled in the islands at Hilo, he brought his native wife to the home he had made and set to work to make a Christian of her; you may readily fancy that his methods were crude, like his orthodoxy, and he indulged in rum and spiritual lessons in unequal proportions, punctuating his teachings in one and his indulgence in the other with wife-beatings to such an extent that the simple-minded woman thought it well to die. This she did, and a jury, who were considering the responsible share that the captain had of her demise, found themselves deprived of any painful duty by the suicide of the captain by the sailor like method of a rope. The girl lived for a time under the charge of a Presbyterian missionary, and became a teacher in the school. She was, and is yet, a beautiful creature, and a young English engineer engaged on one of the big sugar plantations fell in love with her. He was a fine young fellow, and the match was approved by all who had the interests of the two at heart, when one day there appeared on the face of the young girl a blazing red spot, which spread from the cheek to the ear, and then developed into tubercles over the neck—and they said she was a leper.

This happened in June. The inexorable law forced her away to Honolulu. Meanwhile she declared she was not afflicted, and insisted upon having her lover believe she was temporarily in Honolulu visiting and making some purchases, and so on, preparatory to the wedding set for October; but there came a time when she could no longer deceive herself and no one would undeceive him. One day he came to Honolulu on business. It was the day appointed for the sailing of the lepers, and her case rapidly advancing, she, with the rest, was being led to the steamer when her lover saw her. One wild scream from her, and he had dashed at guards in a vain effort to rescue her. In a few minutes he is dragged away by the police, and she, in a fainting condition, is carried to the vessel. All night this girl lay upon her breast sobbing and now, looking as wild as night, she springs ashore and casts a look around. Then she sees the priest standing there, and falling at his feet, clasps his knees and cries for help.

"You are good," she says. "I love him so. He is in prison. I shan't see him again. Let him come to me. He will come. We love each other. I have given him everything, but he does not love me less because I am a leper."

But the priest strove only to raise her. Then she called out; "Oh, God! if this be indeed Thy priest, show me that Thou art kind and move his heart."

I turned away, but I saw that the old priest's cheeks were wet with tears and that he held in his arms the fainting form of one whose greatest grief was not alone in her leprosy.—Honolulu letter to Chicago News.

Negro Philosophy.

During the civil war, though hundreds of colored men at the North and in the South joined the Federal Army and did good service, yet the great mass of the negroes did not seem inclined to risk their lives for the Union. The following dialogue, which took place at a hotel between a guest and a waiter, during the war, may account for the attitude of the colored folks:

Guest—Well, Jim, I suppose you intend to join a colored regiment and become a soldier?

Jim—Me, massa? Oh no; nebber think of it at all.

Guest—Never thought of it! Why, I supposed that all you fellows would be glad to enlist and fight during the war. Why don't you enlist?

Jim—Well, I tell you why. Did you ebber see two dogs fighting for a bone?

Guest—Yes, of course; but what has that to do with the matter?

Jim—Don't you see, massa? de bone nebber fight; de bone take no part in de scuffle. De Norf and Souf are two dogs fighting ober de bone, and we niggers am de bone. We don't propose to take no part in de scuffle whatebber, sah.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

The amazing beauty of the sunsets continues to be a fruitful topic of interest throughout the wide world but as yet nobody has offered a satisfactory solution of the phenomenon. Meanwhile the western sky is glorious with colors almost as vivid as those of a rainbow, and occasionally, the blending of tints is marvelous.

Without any notable or sudden change in the business situation, there is a faint revival of confidence and hope for the future, that may grow into something more substantial if there are no senseless panics inaugurated by the winter failures, which are simply the weeding out of weak concerns, that would not have existed a great length of time under any circumstances.

Presidential electioneering work at Washington is daily exhibited to the public in the vast number of campaign lies early hatched and flying through the air. Some of them are mildly called "canards" and become partially discredited, while the majority are calculated for summer use in the rural districts. Unsuspecting readers will be astonished to learn that a lot of unprincipled Bohemians are already employed and at work in the coming campaign currency for one side or the other, and that this business is tolerated by men who assume to be respected.

The fire insurance people had a hard time of it last year on account of the vast losses by fire—but the life insurance interest, not only escaped trouble, but actually was more successful than in any year of its previous history. There were not only no failures among the legitimate old-line companies last year, but business with nearly all of them was considerably in excess of that ever before done. The total amount of new policies written during 1883 is computed to be over $30,000,000 more than was ever issued before in a similar space of time.

Gov. Robinson of Massachusetts, recommends the enactment of an insolvency law which will afford debtors who owe less than $200 the same privilege of a discharge from their debts which debtors in larger amounts enjoy. Gov. Robinson spoke as a political economist as well as a humane man when he said: "It is always wise and salutary to devise legislation of such a character as will reach the humblest and poorest citizen, who has no voice but his own to present his needs, no power in combination with others to emphasize his opinions." The garnishee process in Massachusetts is often a terror to honest but poor people, and it is to be deprived of some of its terrors by weekly payments instead of monthly.

A bill has been introduced into the senate that will tend to prevent the extortions of attorneys, if it becomes a law. It provides that the regular fee of $10 is not to be paid until the pension is allowed. No other fee is to be allowed except in cases where a special contract is filed in the pension office and approved by the commissioner, and then it shall not exceed $25. Extraordinary services may command an additional fee of $25. These payments shall be made by the agent of the pension office in whose district the claimant shall live, and pension attorneys shall make a sworn statement of the amount that they have received for their services. Any false statement will subject the offender to a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The wicked newspapers are making a good deal of fun over the itemized expenses of the United States Senate lately published. From the accounts of the sergeant-at-arms, it appears that each senator averaged, deducting Sundays and adjournments, over three quarts of mineral water a day during parts of the months of July and August, 1882. The consumption of Apollinaris in these months was also tremendous, the bills for this beverage aggregating $406.50. During the same months the ice bills were $1007, and the enormous total of 201,000 pounds is reported as consumed, or nearly 3000 pounds for each senator, deducting Sundays and adjournments, for the months of July, and August. Seventeen hundred two-grain quinine pills were furnished for senators, who must have had attacks of malaria, and preferred not to call in a doctor. This is ridiculous enough to one who does not understand that a large portion of the Apollinaris, ice bills, quinine, &c., stands for fine wines and cigars, which could not be named without a still greater scandal.

Some of the newspapers, commenting upon the resignation of United States Circuit Judge McCrary, speak of the insufficiency of the salary—which is $6,000 per annum—urge that such positions should pay as much or more than a fortunate lawyer could make in his professional practice, or as much as a corporation would pay. To this a contemporary answers that the theory of our institutions is simplicity in public positions. As the masses of the people can never be rich, it was the design of the fathers of our system that the distance between the high and the low in the scale of fortune should never be a great gulf which neither side should see across. Imbued with this idea, men of liberality and without even a tinge of the vulgar demagogue in their characters, opposed the doubling of the president's salary, and yet condemn the universal tendency to increase official emoluments. When the disparity between the pay of our republican officials of monarchical and aristocratic Europe is pointed out the fact is at once admitted and the argument answered by recalling the purposes for which we instituted a different system. Official life in the United States cannot be what it is abroad, and it is a perversion of the ideas of the founders of our popular system to attempt to make it so. Comparisons between the order of things in our own and that under any other form of government are not opposite, and therefore cannot be instructive.

MINNESOTA NEWS NOTES.

Minnesota State Agricultural Society.

Between thirty and forty members of the State Agricultural society attended the annual meeting at St. Paul, Col. Clark Thompson, president in the chair, and R. O. Judson, secretary.

The report of the committee on credentials occasioned considerable discussion. The act of the legislature requires that to be entitled to representation and votes societies must hold a fair within the year; must have an active membership of twenty-five; must have paid out in premiums as much as was received from the state, and must pay annual dues of $1 for each vote. A motion was made requiring members to make statements as to the above facts. It was decided that but one vote is allowed by the law to such societies as are mentioned.

From the report of auditors it appeared that the receipts for 1883 were $14,068.78, and the expenditures the same saving $157.27 in the treasury.

Col. Clark W. Thompson of Wells, was re-elected President; R. O. Judson, Secretary; and F. J. Wilcox, Rice county, Treasurer.

Senator D. A. Morrison of Rochester was elected first vice president, and G. W. Taylor, Detroit, was chosen second vice president.

As members of the board of managers for the next three years, J. S. Harris, Houston, and John Cooper, Stearns, were chosen.

N. P. Clark of St. Cloud moved that the chair appoint a committee of three to confer with the business men of St. Paul and Minneapolis to discover the best plan for securing ground between the two cities, in perpetuity or for fifty years at least, on which permanent buildings can be erected, and in which a state fair be held annually.

President Thompson announced as members of the committee on permanent location N. P. Clark, St. Cloud, chairman, Charles W. Thompson, Wells, J. S Stevens, Minneapolis, J. F. Norrish, Hastings, and Charles A. A DeGraff, St. Paul. To show the unanimity of sentiment in regard to location of the state fair between St. Paul and Minneapolis the following resolution was adopted without dissent:

Resolved, That this society empower the committee to negotiate with the citizens of St. Paul and Minneapolis for 80 or 100 acres of land for a permanent location of the Minnesota State Agricultural society, if they can secure the free use of said land for the term of fifty years, or a title to the same.

The society then adjourned until the fourth Tuesday in January, 1885.

Second Minnesota Reunion.

The reunion of the Second Minnesota veterans at St. Paul was attended by 92 members of the old regiment, and marked by a spirit of cordiality and good will as creditable as it was genuine and inspiriting. A report of the meeting says: The appearance of the survivors of the Second is in every way creditable. They are a rugged, determined looking body of men, and the years since 1862 have left but few traces of time's flight. The graybeards are the exception, not the rule, and a large majority of the veterans would make the nucleus of a magnificent regiment if their services were needed at this time.

The veterans who came in on trains were met at the depot by the local reception committee, consisting of Col. A. R. Keifer, James Brennan, John Gibbons, Capt J. Manizer, William Bircher, B. F. Irvine, Charles Latham and William S. Wilson. The arrivals were decorated with appropriate badges and escorted to the Metropolitan hotel, where, at 1 o'clock they were invited to partake of a substantial repast.

After dinner the veterans marched to Armory Hall, when they were called to order by Gen. Bishop, president of the association. The roll was called and 92 answered to their names. These were also present field and staff officers, etc.

There was also present three other veterans who participated in the Mill Springs fight: Charles O. Steirle, Company K, Ninth Ohio, now residing at St. Paul; George B. Danham, Eighty-seventh Indians, Spooner, Wis., and John M. Broome, Twelfth Kentucky, Mankato. They were greeted with loud cheers as their names were called. Maj. F. T. Smith, of Company F, Fourth artillery, regular army, was introduced and received an ovation. The four gentlemen were unanimously elected honorary members of the association.

Gen. Bishop invited the association to meet again in St. Paul in 1885. B. D. Pay presented the claims of Mankato. St. Paul was chosen. Gen. Bishop of St. Paul was unanimously re-elected permanent president. A. H. Gleacoe was elected vice president, and Capt J. Mainzer of St. Paul was re-elected treasurer. Col. A. R. Kiefer of St. Paul was chosen as permanent secretary and S. D. Parsons of Minneapolis assistant secretary.

Speeches were made by Gen. Bishop, Gen. R. W. Johnson, Ex-Gov. Marshall, Gen. Jamison. An original poem, by Capt. Reed was read, and letters of regret were read from Gov. Hubbard, Gen. J. B. Sandborn and others.

The evening was joyously spent at the elegant mansion of Gen. Bishop. A generous banquet, toasts, songs, stories etc., were features of the occasion.

The Farmers' hotel at Currie was burned to the ground. Nearly all of the furniture and bedding were saved. Loss about $1,000; no insurance. The fire originated in the wood shed adjoining the hotel.

A sanguinary and desperate fight between two farmers named John Murphy and Hugh Moran, of the town of Nelson, Winona county, took place on the 24th. Murphy was arrested on the 25th and brought to Winona jail by Sheriff Bogart, who says he is wildly insane. Some years ago Murphy was insane for quite a time, and his wife states that for the past few days he has shown symptoms of a return of the malady. Moran lies in a critical state. His nose is broken and he is pounded up in a terrible manner.

A freight train on the Fergus Falls & Black Hills road left Wahpeton for Milnor, and was snowed in and lost on the prairie.

The old log house of J. R. Brown, at Brown's Valley, has been demolished.

Warden Reed at the state prison says the prisoners would have earned $40,030 this year, and in a very few years would have been self-sustaining. The expenses are a trifle under $60,000. With 500 prisoners he is confident he would have the prison pay all its expenses.

John Malloy, boot and shoe dealer at Moorhead, has assigned with liabilities amounting to $4,000, and assets $2,800. The major part of the indebtedness is held by Chicago and Boston parties, though it is stated that some St. Paul dealers are caught upon small amounts.

Losey, who eloped with a Sycamore, Ill., girl, confesses that he is a bad man from Crookston, Minn.

R. M. Worthington, John Stilwell and O. W. Sylvester, of Little Falls, appointed commissioners by Gov. Hubbard to investigate the reported destitution of the Mille Lacs Indians, have performed their duty, but made no formal report. They found the Indians well supplied with food, well clothed, and having money.

Peter Holmlie, while drunk, froze to death eight miles south of Brown's Valley Wednesday the 23d.

A. L. Tockle, merchant tailor of Albert Lea has made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors to B. H. Skang.

Mr. Alberger of Mankato, has succeeded in producing a brick from local clay that without injury will stand tests that will down the best St. Louis fire brick. Samples of the Mankato brick have borne a test of 1,200 deg. Mr. Alberger is preparing to manufacture this brick in quantity in the spring, and every indication promises that this enterprise will become one of the largest and most profitable of Mankato's industries. The best St. Louis and Cincinnati fire brick cost from $45 to $50 per 1,000 and the works in these cities have proved extremely profitable.

MARY'S LOVE ROMANCE.

In the drawing room at Heathcot, in the gray September twilight, Mary Meredith and Felix Trafford sat engaged in earnest conversation.

"I really can not see any cause for your despair, dear Felix. Have I not told you how dearly I love you? No power on earth shall ever force me to break my plighted troth to you. Have you no confidence in me?"

"All confidence Mary; I know you will be true to me."

"Then what is your fear?"

"Everything. You are young and beautiful, the rich Mr. Meredith's only child, while I am a poor clerk in the house of the Meredith Brothers, with nothing but an unsullied reputation, some brains and a good right hand to help me through the world."

"So much the better, then, that I am the daughter of the rich Mr. Meredith. Dear Felix, papa esteems you, and has implicit confidence in your honor. He invites you here, and allows our acquaintance. Why do you annoy yourself about imaginary troubles?"

"Your father trusts me and I must be true to him, you and myself. I will go to him and frankly confess our attachment. I should feel miserable otherwise."

"Go now; he is in his study."

Felix caught the girl in his arms and kissed her rosy lips.

"Your confidence inspires me with hope," he said, and went away on his mission. Tapping at Mr. Meredith's study door, and receiving permission to enter, Felix approached the old gentleman, who gave him his hand, saying:

"Why, boy, you are an unexpected visitor. No bad news, I hope?"

"No, sir; but I want to ask of you a gift so precious that I have very little hope of obtaining it."

"Well, well, name it. I am always glad to favor you if I can."

Felix was greatly agitated, but summoned up all the courage and said:

"Mr. Meredith, I love your daughter. I do not, however, ask you to give her to me now. Only let me hope that when I prove to you——"

Mr. Meredith leaned back in his chair amazed. It had never occurred to him that this young clerk would dare to lift his eyes to his daughter.

"You are an ungrateful, treacherous scoundrel!" he cried. "Out of compassion for your friendlessness I admitted you to my house and my daughter's society, and you, villian that you are have taken the opportunity to steal into and win her inexperienced heart. Begone, sir, and never let me see your face again!"

"Listen to me one moment, Mr. Meredith."

"Not one second!" cried the old man, as he violently brought down his clenched fist upon the table. "Leave the house instantly or the servants shall thrust you out." And as if to put his threat into execution he fiercely rang the bell.

As Felix staggered along the passage, his heart so oppressed with contending emotions that he was scarcely conscious of anything, he met Mary, who, alarmed at the violent ringing of the bell, was rushing to her father's study. Felix wildly threw his arms about her, kissing her again and again. Then he tore himself away and rushed from the house.

Mary never knew what occurred at that terrible interview. Mr. Meredith was deaf to all her entreaties and her lover had disappeared. The poor girl was stricken with brain fever, and for weeks her life hung in the balance. Repentance came to the unhappy father, for although sought for far and near Felix could not be found. At length youth and a good constitution brought back health to the heart-broken girl. But alas! the blooming young Hebe of seventeen summers was no more. In her place a tall, pale girl appeared, but with a beauty that even the most fastidious admired. The golden brown curls that clustered around her temples lay in rippling waves upon a brow as pure as snow, and the soft, lustrous hazel eyes wore an expression of sadness that told of the heart grief that would be hers forever.

Mr. Meredith traveled with his daughter through all the most attractive parts of Europe for a year. Then, at her request, he took her home. Mary had become a woman, a bright, intelligent, glorious woman, and crowds of admirers worshipped at her feet; but the image of Felix was still as fresh as ever in her heart, and the vows she had exchanged with him were never for a moment forgotten. Therefore, all offers of marriage were at once declined.

Time rolled on. Mary had now reached her twenty-eighth year, and still remained a maiden beneath the paternal roof.

One cold winter evening Mary sat by the glowing fire in her father's drawing-room. Her small white hands were clasped upon her bosom, and her eyes were cast downward until the long lashes lay like golden pencilings upon her cheek. Near her, in his great arm-chair, sat Mr. Meredith, with the snows of many winters on his head and his face deeply furrowed by the hand of time. There was an expression of care upon his countenance. He looked troubled and unhappy.

"Mary," said he continuing a conversation that had been going on between them, "all my life I have made your happiness my constant study and have given you a luxurious home. Now you are advancing in years, and I shall ere long be separated from you by death. How can I leave you alone in this cold world? A home is now open to you, and you must accept it. It is not because I owe this man a very large sum that I insist upon this marriage, although if you refuse him we will be sunk into the most abject poverty, for I would rather endure all the misery of the situation than risk your well-being; but I know you will be happy with Mr. Ambrose for a husband. He is good and kind, as well as very rich."

"Rich in what, father?"

The old man started at these words, but at length answered:

"In honor and manhood." Mary said no more. "The crisis is now upon me," continued Mr. Meredith, "In a few short days I shall be overwhelmed with misery if you do not rescue me. Mr. Ambrose has asked me for your hand. He has seen you many times and loves you."

"And Mr. Ambrose makes my hand the price of your safety?"

"No, he has not said so; but he is aware of my situation, and knowing it, asks the hand of my child. It seems to me as if God had kept you free to save your old father from ruin. What answer am I to return to Mr. Ambrose?"

"My heart was broken long ago," Mary answered, looking into her father's face. "I will marry this man for your sake, but he must not expect affection, for I have none to give. Tell him this that he may not be deceived."

"I will bring him here to-morrow evening, for he is anxious that the interview shall be over."

Mr. Meridith was relieved, the fear of disgrace was removed from him, and he rejoiced in the prospect of a prosperous marriage for his daughter.

On the following evening Mary again sat by the drawing-room fire. She was alone now and calm, and her face was as pale as Parisian marble. The outer door opened and she heard the sound of heavy footsteps in the hall. Once more the image of Felix arose before her; a cold shiver passed over her and unbidden tears trembled in her eyes, but by a great effort she subdued her agitation before her father and the man about to buy her with his gold entered the drawing-room. Mary arose and extended her hand; it was as cold as ice, but it did not tremble. She glanced at Mr. Ambrose and saw a man of medium height with brilliant dark eyes; the neatly trimmed beard concealed the lower part of his visage. He greeted her politely and then took a seat. A short time was spent in conversation, but gradually a silence fell upon them, which was becoming oppressive when the visitor broke the spell.

"Miss Meredith," he said in a soft, low tone, "you are of course aware of the object of my visit here? Pardon me if I speak plainly."

Mary looked up, but made no reply. Mr. Ambrose's voice was so kind and gentle that she thought he deserved a wife who could love him.

"Your father has told me you have no love to give me, but that you will marry me. I, too, once thought I should never love again, but the sight of you has dispelled the illusion. Let me tell you my story. Long years ago I loved a beautiful young girl, and she returned my affection. I was young then, and did not dream that Fate could crush out my soul's dearest hope. That fair girl was my all, my very life, and I had not a thought of the future separated from her. Her father was a wealthy merchant and I his poor clerk. When I told him I loved his daughter he spurned me from his door and ordered me never to enter it again. Oh, who beside myself can ever know the utter midnight of my blasted hopes! Crushed and broken I fled in my despair. In the whirl and excitement of business I strove to forget my sorrows. Fortune singled me out as her especial favorite. My wildest speculations were successful and money accumulated as if by magic. Thus eleven years passed. I returned to the scene of my unhappiness and saw you. Need I say that all the old love surged up in my heart again? Once more I asked the old merchant for his daughter—" the speaker's lips trembled; he extended his arms as he continued—"and he consents at last. Oh, Mary! will you now be mine?"

Mary cast herself into her suitor's outstretched arms. After all these years of misery Felix was restored to her!

"Felix Trafford!" gasped the old man as he started to his feet. "Felix Trafford, my old clerk!"

"Yes, sir; the same. Do you retract your promise?"

"No Felix, no. Take my Mary and forgive her father."

The happy suitor led Mary away to a seat and sat beside her, as if he feared he might lose her again.

"Let us," he said, "forget all the past but its joys and look to the future for what true love can give us. I am now content, and you my Mary, are you happy in the restoration of your lover?"

"Ah!" she replied in a voice full of deep emotion, "happiness is too poor a word to express my great joy!"—Philadelphia Call.

Tennyson as a Money-Maker.

London Correspondence of the Philadelphia Press.

I have heard repeatedly, of late that, Tennyson would have no means to support his new rank. He should not find it difficult. If he be as unsociable and inhospitable as a baron as he has been as plain Alfred Tennyson, his sustainment of the title need not be expensive. The common opinion that he is only too well to-do is erroneous. For a literary man he is very rich. No author in America has ever begun to make so much money as he. His poetry has brought him, it is estimated, £80 000 or 800,000, at least, and the sum has been put as high as £100,000 and, £120,000. Being a careful, not to say close, manager, he has so invested his earnings as to have a property worth at present £220,000, or $1,000,000 He owns, or did recently, a house in town, where he spends very little time; he has a beautiful place at Farringford, Isle of Wight, and another country-seat at Aldworth in Surrey. For a poet he is very practical, driving very sharp bargains with his publishers, holding out for the last shilling.

No banker or broker in Lombardist, conducts his affairs more shrewdly. He has frequently changed his publishers, who, to secure him, are obliged to give him the most generous terms. The firm with which he now deals pays him extraordinary prices for the exclusive right to issue his complete works; but he would demand more if he had any chance of getting it. A publisher who has in the past done much business with him, says he ought to be called Moses Tennyson, and that, if he had not turned poet, he would have made a brilliant pawnbroker.

It is not strange that he attaches great value to his writings, for he takes unwearied and endless pains with them. His is the toil of composition produced by brain sweat. It is an agony of labor which nothing but supreme self-love or superlative literary ambition would enable him to endure. He often spends hours on a single line, and has been known to devote a whole week to one short poem. It is more than fifty-four years since he won the Chancellor's medal at Cambridge for "Timbuctoo," a piece of blank verse, and he has been wreaking himself ever since on expression. In that time he has done work enough to wear out a score of ordinary men; but he has ever been sustained by a robust constitution, abundant exercise, and a degree of vanity that passes all understanding. If genius be, as some declare, unlimited capacity for work, Tennyson is a genius of the highest order. For a generation he has been stimulated by a great reputation, which has not been eclipsed for more than forty years. To this may be added his love of gain; for he is sure of reaping a large recompense on every bit of writing, whatever its quality.

In India the remarkable sunsets of November created superstitious fear, and numbers of holy men went about preaching impending disaster.

AGRICULTURAL TOPICS.

Agricultural Notes.

Mr. J. A. Bill, Lyme, Conn., tried the "ten-hour system," and says his men, with "Bungtown" watches and heavy "gold" chains, sat around logs telling puns when it was seven o'clock in the morning. "The next year he ran his farm himself."

A farmer is mentioned by The Catham Courier who, upon turning a horse into the field, leads him along the wire fence and brings his nose a few times in contact with the barbs. After that experience the intelligent animals keep at a safe distance, and none have been injured.

Unless the house be warm and the food wholesome and abundant, the hens will furnish very few eggs. The birds enjoy the winter sunshine.

Some prefer to sell all their swine and buy what "hog products" they desire; but as a rule, it is preferable to kill what is needed at home, even when not necessary, as it is on a majority of farms perhaps. One then knows the healthfulness and quality of what he is eating, and with a little experience and skill, farm slaughtering is more economical. The introduction of pulleys and some other simple contrivances, enabling one or two men to handle and dress a considerable number of heavy hogs in a few hours, has, in recent years, done away with the dread and much of the importance of "butchering day."—American Agriculturist.

Professor S. Johnson of the Michigan Agricultural College has made many experiments with ensilage during the past few years. He finds it better to have several small silos, or divisions, than one large one; that weighting with stones, barrels of earth, etc., is more satisfactory than a screw; and the silo is one of the most economical methods of storing fodder. Professor Johnson finds three tons of ensilage equal in feeding value to one ton of hay, and therefore a fair crop of ensilage means the growing of an equivalent to six to ten tons of hay per acre. Ensilage is a cheap substitute for roots—but an expensive crop for the general farmer.—American Agriculturist.

Cooking Recipes.

Baked Sweet Apples.—Wash them, do not pare or core them, set them in the oven in a baking pan with a little water in it, and bake slowly for several hours. When done they will be of a rich, dark brown color.

Oyster Omelet.—Add to half a cup of cream six eggs well beaten, season with pepper and salt, pour into a frying pan, having first melted in it a tablespoonful of butter; drop in a dozen large oysters cut in halves or chopped fine with parsley, and fry a light brown. Double it over and serve immediately.

Pressed Chicken.—Boil one or two chickens in a small quantity of water, salt to taste, and when thoroughly done, take all the meat from the bones, having removed the skin; chop the light and dark meat separately and season to taste. Put a layer of light and dark meat alternately into a crock, till all the meat is used, pour over it the liquor in which it was boiled, and put on it a small weight. When cold, cut in slices and serve. Cracker crumbs may be mixed with the meat if desired.

Breakfast and Tea Waffles.—One pint of sifted flour, milk enough to make a thin batter, about two-thirds of a pint, two eggs well beaten, a tablespoonful of butter melted and a little salt. Mix milk and flour first to smooth paste, add salt and butter, lastly eggs. Have waffle irons hot as for griddle cakes; butter or grease them with pork. Pour in enough batter to cover iron, put the cover carefully down upon it, keep over the fire about half a minute, turn over quickly, leaving about same time. Remove, sprinkle lightly with powdered sugar if desired; keep hot until ready to serve.

A delicious hard sauce is made of thin shavings of maple sugar mixed with butter. It is just the thing for hot puddings.

If cayenne pepper is sprinkled plentifully in the resorts of rats, they will resent the hospitable treatment and will retire from the premises.

Roads That Need Reforming.

Major Hugh T. Brooks remarks that the cost of bad roads can never be summed up till we are able to compute the value of time, life, health and happiness. Part of his tale of "frightful losses," traceable to this source, we quote from Rural Home:

"Here are farmers going ten miles to market with forty bushels of wheat when they might draw eighty with more ease if the roads were suitably graded and prepared—half the day thrown away. A well broken team will move several tons on a road level smooth and hard. Here is a valuable young horse, stuck in the mud; indiscreetly urged he takes issue with his driver and passes into the category of 'balky' animals. Here is a span of horses jaded, spavined and windbroken by drawing loads over steep, slippery and miry places. Here are people overtaken by storms dragging slowly along through mud and mire, immensely uncomfortable. Here are invalids who started out for health delayed and damaged by the rough and rutty ways. Here are persons going on moonless midnights to minister to the sick and dying, themselves in imminent danger from the protuberances, pits and precipices that line the roadsides."

And here, in conclusion, are the writer's views as to "what we ought to do about it:"

"We should secure a good grade, either by passing around the hills which can often be done without much increase of distance, or by carting them into the valleys. A steep hill on a leading road, compelling teamsters to load light, generation after generation, costs ten times as much as it would cost to grade it down. Soft ground should be turnpiked, the road-bed raised high, with deep little ditches at the sides, having a free outlet for water, and no scraping in of sod, clay and muck afterward. Small stones and very coarse gravel at least a foot thick well rounded up and covered with a little fine gravel make a good roadbed, and nothing else will. After putting the road into proper shape, don't tolerate ruts, but hoe back the gravel every few days till the road is smooth and well-settled."

About Salting the Soil.

Common salt spread upon the ground has the effect of aiding in the solution of mineral matters used in stiffening the stems of plants. If there is already a sufficiency of such matters in solution in the soil, an application of salt will do no good. Salt is most efficacious in mucky ground and whenever there is an excess of organic matter. It is not supposed to act directly as food for grain-producing plants. If it does anything toward increasing grain crops, it does so by way of stiffening the straw and keeping it from lodging. It is a cheap product, costing only about $5 a ton to produce it in bulk at the works, and ought to be bought for a fair profit and freight added. Whenever salt is needed it often pays many times its cost, but there is so much land on which it does no good that it would be imprudent to use it to any large extent without first determining, in a small way, whether it will be useful or not. As its usefulness depends wholly upon the condition of the soil, no specific value can be fixed for it in advance of using it, as there can for barnyard manures and the commercial fertilizers, nor can it be used as a substitute for any of the real fertilizers or for land plaster. It is most frequently used for sowing on wheat in the spring, which it sometimes greatly benefits and sometimes not at all. Its specific action is most marked upon the beet family.—Professor L. B. Arnold.

Walks Between Farm Buildings.

The grounds about most farm-houses are poorly supplied with walks. Sometimes there is no way to approach the house from the street or go from the house to the well or farm buildings, except to travel over ground that is covered with turf. During a large portion of the year, and especially in the winter, it is necessary to pass through mud or snow. As a consequence damp feet are among the penalties attached to passing out of the house during unpleasant weather. Of course, it is very difficult to keep the floors of a dwelling clean when the occupants are obliged to walk through mud every time they go out. There should be good walks leading from the street to the entrances of the house, and to the well and the various out-buildings. They not only promote comfort but save a large amount of work in taking care of the house. Very good and serviceable walks may be made by nailing plank to scantlings placed on edge. The walks may be from two to three feet wide, according to the width of the planks. Walks constructed in this manner are easily kept free from snow, as they may be swept off as often as is necessary. The only objection to them is the difficulty in driving across them. The difficulty may be obviated by raising the drive-way for teams or by placing inclined planks or timbers against the sides of the walks. Good walks may also be made of flat stone or gravel confined between pieces of timber. To prevent the timbers from spreading they should be fastened together at suitable distances by means of cross-pieces. The gravel should be clean and the surface of the walk should be slightly rounded so as to carry off water.—Chicago Times

Beautifying the Home.

Now that the holidays are over and we will no longer indulge in giving fancy work to our friends, it is hoped that most women will have time to do something toward beautifying their own homes. At least some one nice piece of needlework should be commenced, and if possible be finished before the spring cleaning. One very effective piece of work is this: Take a piece of drab or olive felt suitable for the cover of a chair cushion and another for the back of the chair; on these have patterns stamped. The prettiest sort of decoration is that in which antique work and embroidery are combined, and there are many of these which are attractive and yet are not laborious. The framework of the chair should be low, and the felt should be bordered with plush or velvet of a darker shade. Another very pretty piece of work is the cover for a sofa pillow. This may be of olive felt with a large spray of flowers in Kensington embroidery; have the branch or stem start at one corner. A border and back of dark crimson velvet is all the finish a cushion needs to make it elegant. Another cushion cover is made by putting a bias stripe of crimson velvet diagonally across the cushion, and on each side of this put stripes made by sewing strips of velvet or velvet ribbon together—the corners should be of the plain velvet, and the back also; put two small soft tassels at each corner.—N. Y. Post.

Decorative Notes.

Slipper Bags—Large bags to place slippers in for parties, or to carry rubbers or waterproof to opera or theater, are made of gray, brown or stone color with a monogram embroidered, braided or outlined in the center.

Comb Cases—Cases for brushes, combs and sponges are not hard to make, and useful in protecting them from dust. Brush broom cases ornamented with applique work, or with a monogram worked in silk, or with a bunch of flowers are very pretty.

Window Curtains—Very pretty and inexpensive curtains can be made of cheese cloth, and the materials required for an ordinary-sized window cost only $1.50. They can be made with or without a border, and are pretty either way.

Should the border not be used, turn a hem three inches wide down the front, and across the bottom of the curtain. This should be caught down with herring-bone stitch in gold-colored silk.

The curtain is then embroidered over with rings, double rings may be called, executed in chain stitch with embroidery silk.

In each set of rings there should be one of gold silk, the other of different color, such as gold and blue, gold and cardinal, gold and green. Brown will also contrast prettily with gold. Crewels may be used instead of silk, although in that case the embroidery will present a heavier appearance.

They can be hung on poles or cornices, which ever may be most convenient, although poles are almost invariably used.

The curtains are very pretty if made with a border of darned work, and, for design, sprays of autumn leaves can be arranged with good effect, embroidering each spray with different colored silks, cardinal, gold, brown and green. Draw the stitches from point to stem of the leaf, and then darn back and forth through the silk stitches only from side to side of each leaf, as in darning a stocking, but do not let the stitches sew through the material. Then outline each leaf round the edge with the same color in chain-stitch. This shows each leaf in solid color on the light ground.

A straight line of herring-bone stitch on the inside of the border, dividing it from the groundwork of the curtain, gives a pretty finish. They have somewhat the appearance of the Madras curtains now so much used, and as the work is not at all difficult, one feels well repaid when the pretty drapery is hung at the windows.

Catchalls.—Pretty catchalls are made of paper fans, with the rivet which holds the sticks together withdrawn and a cord substituted. The fan is drawn together and one stick lapped upon the other and fastened, thus making a cone-shaped receptacle. A cornucopia of coarse, strong paper is fitted into this, and ribbon passed in and out between the sticks form bows in front. A ribbon loop is attached by which to suspend the catchall.

The accumulation of unclaimed property in the dead letter office has become so rapid that yearly sales are necessary, and one will begin January 15. The printed catalogue contains 4,000 lots.

Personal Paragraphs.

Captain Arthur Spring, a merchant of Callao, Peru, about three years ago left a fortune of $1,500,000 to his cousin, John Spring. Inquiries were set on foot for the latter, but he was not discovered till three weeks before his death, which happened at Virginia City, Nevada, a few days ago.

A young lady in Salem, Mass., who is a very clever amateur artist, has decorated a set of tiles about one of the fire places in the ancestral mansion which her family has occupied for generations, with sprays of apple blossoms, painted from boughs taken from a tree which George Washington planted on the grounds, and which is still flourishing.

In the Connecticut house of representatives is Jeffrey O. Phelps, of Lewisburg, serving his first term. Mr. Phelps' father, Jeffrey O. Phelps served one term in the house and one in the senate. His grandfather, Jeffrey O. Phelps, Sr., served five terms in the house. His great-grandfather, Noah A. Phelps, served five terms. His great great-grandfather, Noah Phelps, served nineteen terms. His great, great, great-grandfather, David Phelps seven terms. His great, great, great, great-grandfather eighteen terms.

The duchess of Edenburgh, the Crown Prince and Princess of Denmark, Princess Victoria, the wife of Prince William of Prussia, and other royal personages, will attend the marriage of the Russian Grand Duke Constantine to Princess Elizabeth, of Saxe-Altenberg, which will be solemnized soon at the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg.

It is reported that the Duchess of Montrose, who offended her family by marrying Mr. Crawford, a leading sporting man in England, intends to proclaim her love for her second husband, who lately died, by erecting in his memory a tomb of unprecedented grandeur. She has bought a fine site in London at an immense cost, and says she will erect upon it a monument that will beat the world in this particular line. Her ambition is, so she says, to excel the tribute of Artemesia, whose magnificent sepulcher to her deceased, Mausolus, gave the name to ambitious monumental architecture.

George P. A. Healy, during a chat in New York, said: "When I was painting Prince Bismarck I found him very grumpy. But before the work was completed he became very affable and asked me to paint a portrait of his wife and daughter. Dore? Yes, I know him well. I recall that the last time I saw him he was in ecstacies about the American women, whose graces he thought unexcelled.

Gen. Sherman talked like the blunt warrior that he is when some Missouri stockmen called on him the other day. "Missouri," he assured them, "is the laughing-stock of the Union," adding that Georgia even was heading her in progress, that she was comparatively as undeveloped as the interior of Africa, when, as the centre of the United States, she should be in the van of civilization.

Miss Mackey, daughter of the California Bonanza king, disappointed her mother's society friends Sunday in Paris by failing to make her much-heralded debut as soprano in the choir of the Passionist Church, in Avenue Hoche. The church was crowded in anticipation of the event by an ultra-fashionable gathering, which had been educated to expect a great performance from the American heiress, and who were bewildered at Miss Mackey's failure to appear. After mass it was explained that the young lady was quite ill from attack of bronchitis.

Mrs. J. Mackey's jewel chest, which she keeps in the vaults of a Paris banking house, contains the finest collection of precious stones outside of a royal treasury, that exists in Europe. It is valued at something like $1,000,000. Foremost in the collection shows resplendent the famous set of sapphires which attracted so much attention when exhibited by the jeweler Boucheron at the Parisian universal exhibition of 1878. It is valued at $300,000, and comprises the diadem, bracelets, ring, earrings and necklace, with a large pendant. The necklace is double, the upper row being a band of large square diamonds, and sapphires fitting the throat closely, while the lower row, a wide arabesque of the same stones, supports the pendant. This last is composed of one enormous sapphire, peerless in color and in water, and set in large diamonds. This stone is of the size of a pigeon's egg, cut transeversely, a perfect oval in shape, and is alone valued at $3,000.

A BABY GIANT.

Over Seven Feet in Height, and Still Growing.

From the San Francisco Examiner.

Some two weeks ago the crowd of loiterers who infest the foot of Market street were struck dumb with amazement at the sight of a colossal individual emerging from the ferry gate. Before anyone of the crowd had recovered from his astonishment the giant walked quietly towards the next slip and got on board the Petaluma boat. The crowd hung around the landing for some time waiting for the rest of the circus, but were disappointed, and it was soon ascertained that the Goliah was all alone. Speculation was rife as to who or what he was. His height was variously estimated at from eight to twelve feet. A federal officer stated postively, that it was Chang, the Chinese giant, who had slipped in at some way port in disguise so as to beat the restriction act. An Examiner reporter solved the mystery yesterday. At a Sansome street hotel he discovered the mammoth, or as he might be more aptly termed, the baby-giant. His name is Thomas Robinson, and he is but 17 years old. His height is seven feet in his stockings, and he is still growing. He was born in East Canada, and has always worked on a farm. He never rode on a railway until he left home, some two months ago. His parents are Irish his father being nearly six feet high. He states that he never attracted any attention at home, because nearly all the men there are six feet or over. He had no idea he was a wonder until he reached Chicago, where he attracted considerable attention. His weight is 200 pounds, and he would be taller if he did not turn up so much at the feet, which are of immense proportions. In answer to a question as to what size of boots he wore he replied good naturedly, "I dont know exactly; the shoemaker at Omaha said the next size was the boot-box." He has a pleasant face, blue eyes, and is apparently very intelligent. His arms are of immense length, but the hands are comparatively small. On being asked to take "something" he called for soda-water, saying that he did not like whisky, because he might get into a quarrel and fall on some one. A suggestion thrown out by the bar-keeper that the train to meet Sullivan called forth the remark, "Well, I ain't so bad with the gloves as you may think." He has had many offers to join traveling shows, but he says he would prefer to work on a farm.

THE WHEAT QUESTION

Is now the all-important topic of interest to the people of the Northwest. Associations are being formed in almost every county and town and the system of wheat-buying, whereby the producer is wronged out of all of the profits of his labor is the general topic of conversation everywhere and is everywhere condemned. People are not only talking it among themselves but they are writing it to their friends abroad advising them not to come here at present until the time comes when an open market gives the wheat raiser a fair and equal chance for a reasonable profit. Many who are so situated that they cannot change from wheat to stock are seriously contemplating selling out and going elsewhere—in fact if they could realize anything like half value for their investment many would sell out and leave too quick for well they know that if the present system of wheat buying continues it means ruin and beggary to every man who raises any quantity of wheat. If wheat was always worth one dollar per bushel in the markets of the Northwest the producer could manage to make a fair profit supposing he gets 20 bushels per acre; but when a man only gets from 10 to 12 bushels per acre, pays the high prices which we have had to pay for labor, the prices we have had to pay for provisions, for teams, for machinery, for lumber, for wood in fact for everything he needs, and the high rates of interest on all unpaid accounts which he carries he can make no money at one dollar per bushel. Now, in the outset, (in most of cases) if a man does not produce at least twenty bushels per acre he may well examine his own methods of cultivation for the reason, because most of our soil, with thorough cultivation will do that and the millers can not be blamed if the farmer don't get it. The past fall proved to be one in which the wheat raiser absolutely needed every facility that could be afforded him in order to pull through and make even a small profit and this the millers' association have prevented effectually and herein they have wronged the farmer. The farmer invests his little all in taking up a government quarter or buying a railroad quarter and improving it, trusting to make enough out of his venture to pay for his land and secure a comfortable home for himself and family content if he attains his object, but powerless to control the prices of his commodities sufficiently to INSURE such return. The present railroad company bought this line to make big money out of it and they have the power to so control circumstances that they are absolutely sure to accomplish their purpose and their receipts show that the company is and has been all of the time making large profits. The elevator companies have invested their means with a view to making money handling the wheat; they are entitled to, should and do realize ample returns from their investments. The millers have invested their money in mills to grind the wheat they should have a fair share in the profits of the business. If it costs the the farmer 75 cents to produce a bushel of wheat in the market, and he has to sell for less his loss is estimated by the amount less than 75 cents which he gets. The wheat raised in this county this fall has not cost one cent less than 75 and it has not averaged over 65 which is a clear loss of 10 cents per bushel for this county. If this condition of affairs was justified by the price of wheat in the east no one could grumble, but it is far from being the case as well we know that a difference of from 22 to 25 cents has existed between this market and Minneapolis all the fall, to say nothing of the profits the millers make manipulating grades. The millers are protected in business, and are making big money, the elevators are protected in their business and make big money, the railroad company is able to protect itself and makes big money and the farmers has to STAND THE RACKET. He produces the wheat and the other fellows get it. That is just the way the present system works. The company claim and with truth that their interests are identical with the farmers' interests and as the company is the only instrument at present that can remedy the evil and if the farmer has not experience enough in such matters to suggest a remedy and ask for it then it is for the interest for the company to devise some means if they are sincere in their professions. The farmer asks to be allowed cars to ship and the merchant asks to be allowed to build wheat houses to handle grain in. The company replies that this is impracticable. Well, if so then some other means must be tried for the present system will ruin the country and the sooner the remedy is found and applied the better will it be for all concerned.

FARMERS MEETING.

The farmers meeting was held at city hall on Saturday after noon, Mr. M. R. Brown in the chair. After the regular routine business, during which the railroad committee reported that owing to a misunderstanding in appointments they had failed to act, the committee was discharged and speeches were declared in order. Mr. J. F. Brown said that if the millers cannot handle our No. 1 hard wheat profitably at an average of 65 cents per bushel the farmers certainly can not raise wheat profitably at that figure which proves conclusively that the system is radically wrong and should be changed. He said the farmers stand looking into a dark hole which they see wheat go in but never see it afterwards. Farmers must stop raising wheat and try something else for it is not right to keep on in a business in which we lose so much and thus encourage the poor millers to still continue to throw away and waste their money. Mr. Childs thought he could see daylight in the "dark hole." He thought the "little joker" was too plainly to be seen in there in the system which is in vogue whereby the farmer is made to sustain the loss every time and the miller is the gainer in a like degree. He said a railroad to Duluth would let the daylight into that "dark hole" and let our wheat out into the daylight. Urged the importance of the road. Many speeches were made, all agreeing upon the necessity for action of some kind. H. E. Cooke moved that the meeting proceed to form a farmer's association. Carried. Mr. J. T. Brown moved that H. E. Cooke, M. R. Brown, W. P. Carlton, B. D. Childs and K. D. Chase be appointed a committee to draft a constitution and by laws for the Farmers Association. Carried. Moved that the secretary appoint a committee of one in every town in the county to collect affidavits on the wheat question, said affidavits to be used by the committee which shall be appointed to confer with the railroad authorities. Carried. Mr. Isadore Fortier offered the use of his hall free for future meetings. Moved that when we adjourn we adjourn to meet at Fortier's hall on Saturday, Feb. 2d, at 2 p. m. Mr. B. D Childs moved a vote of thanks to the Pioneer Press correspondent, Mr. C. M. Shults for his very impartial report of the situation as given in the Pioneer Press of date Jan. 21st 1884. Adjourned until Saturday Feb 2d at 2 p. m. at Fortiers Hall.

RAISE LESS WHEAT!

It is the intention of many farmers to raise less wheat this year and to get into stock more. If our farmers would adopt this system generally it would be far better for them and for the country. It is in fact what has got to be done before this country can ever get down to solid business.

Railroad Meeting.

A large and enthusiastic railroad meeting was held at East Grand Forks on Saturday last. The hall was filled with farmers from Polk County and many of the representative men of Grand Forks were there. J. W. Howes was chosen chairman and F. J. Duffy secretary. The call for the meeting was read by the chairman explaining the object and the necessity for another outlet to relieve us from the monopoly now existing. Mr. E. Masterson, in a very masterly manner gave the history of the Grand Forks, Crookston & Duluth R. R. company and an outline of the country through which the road is to run and urged united, and vigorous support from the farmers of Polk County to the road. Many speeches, of the same tenor were heartily received. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That we, as citizens and tax payers of Polk County, Minn., here assembled, do extend our hearty co-operation to the incorporators of the proposed Grand Forks, Crookston & Lake Superior railroad; that we will render all the aid in our power to secure another outlet, other than the Manitoba road furnishes, and that we favor the bonding of Polk County in the sum of $200,000 towards that end."

THE WHEAT QUESTION.

Correspondent to the Grand Forks Herald.

The Manvel-Pillsbury position as published in Friday's issue of The Herald, to the effect that "All agreed that no definite or specific charges of wrong had yet been made, but that they fully met the same and disabused the mind of the complainant that he was injured, either in regard to grading or transportation," only lacks in one small element, that is truth. Of course, it is well understood that this is a very insignificant thing to these kings of monopoly, who are now engaged in a desperate effort to excuse the pernicious operation of their system of monopoly, which is now grinding out the very life and substance of our country.

The "all agreeing" parties to the Manvel-Pillsbury proposition, evidently comprised the R. R., elevator representatives and their sycophantic guests, the Grain Inspectors of Dakota. The claim that no definite or specific charges of wrong, either in grading or transportation of wheat, had been made, but what had been met and the aggrieved parties minds' disabused of wrong perpetrated therein, is absolutely false in every particular, the statements of Manvel-Pillsbury to the contrary notwithstanding.

Crookston and adjacent towns had some hundreds of sworn statements ready for these gentlemen for Wednesday's meeting, and how were they heard? Not one of these affidavits was heard, the balance of the time being taken up by Mr. Manvel and the elevator representatives, in a desperate effort to excuse the operation of their pernicious system of monopoly, and to divert the attention of the meeting to anything and everything outside of the question under consideration, even to that of the manufacture of butter in Ireland; the proposition of Mr. Hill to stock the whole Northwest with the offspring of a herd of blooded stock; the proposed cost to him, of which would be about $90,000. When fastened down to a case of grading and weight stealing, how was it met? Why, a desperate attempt on the part of the plausible Pillsbury to demonstrate how difficult it was for any but the most expert agent to discover the slight difference between "No. 1 hard" and "frosted wheat." And yet, in less than an hour he stultified his sham pretext by suggesting the establishment of a sixth grade for the wheat of this country after excusing his agents for grading No 1 hard as "frosted wheat," and claiming that the farmers were very unjust in attempting to hold either the agents or elevators responsible for these irregularities in grading. In the case of weight stealing, the excuse set up was; all business men are liable to make mistakes in figures and their agents being human were no less liable to make mistakes in figuring the weights of wheat purchased, and therefore, it was very unjust to hold them responsible for such mistakes.

Mr. Editor, I had witnessed a part of this sham, this farce of a so called investigation into charged abuses in grading, weights and transportation of wheat, at Crookston on Wednesday, and when the chairman of the meeting held here on Thursday, called for statements concerning abuses, I was not willing to see our citizens contribute to a farce predetermined by the railroad and elevator representatives, as a scheme for the whitewashing of their corporations, and I addressed the chairman to the effect that sufficient charges had been set forth by our chamber of commerce in their [illegible] monopoly given the elevators in the transportation of wheat to the injury of the producer; the great abuses arising from the monopoly thus given in constituting the elevator monopolies regulators of the wheat market of the Northwest, and the abuses in irregular, low grading and stealing by weights which constitute the sum total of all the abuses charged throughout the Northwest to these monopolies. These charges were well known to every man, woman and child capable of reasoning, in this valley. These gentlemen representing the monopolies are intelligent men and are in position to know of, and understand the operation and existence of these charged abuses as well as any man in this valley. The charges are sufficiently definite for them to answer, and until they do answer, and make some proposition for relief, I, for one, am opposed to entering into or taking part in any pre-arranged farce. This, in substance, was my proposition and not as your evening contemporary says, "Dr. Collins proposed to put the railroad company and elevator representatives on the defensive without charges," and "that it was impracticable to procure sworn statements from farmers concerning specific charges."

The same mode of reasoning and meeting charges in the Crookston meeting put forth by the representatives of the great monopolies which are sapping the life and vitality of this country, were re-enacted at the meeting held on Thursday. They did not deny or attempt to deny the monopoly given to elevators in the transportation of wheat, to the injury of the producers and extinction of independent purchasers. They did not deny this monopoly constituted the elevator companies and millers' association of Minneapolis, regulators of the wheat market of Northwest. They did not deny past and existing irregularities in grading and weights, in the purchase of wheat by elevator agents. It is true they attempted to excuse agents for irregular grading on the ground of fine judgment required to discover the difference between "No. 1 hard" and "frosted wheat," and that mistakes were liable to be made in weights; but that there was any fraud in errors of judgment and mistaken in weights they did deny and would not consent to be held responsible therefor.

They did not deny that they had, and would continue, systematically, to crush and destroy independent elevators or competition in the purchase of wheat. They did not deny that when the millers of Fergus Falls, Minnesota, refused to be governed by the elevator companies' grading and price of wheat at that point, and paid five cents per bushel more than the elevators, that the elevator companies had systematically entered into a combination to destroy the wheat market of that place by paying five cents a bushel more at adjacent towns than the millers could pay at Fergus Falls. These kings of monopoly set forth their claims to omnipotent right to regulate and control the wheat market of the territory occupied by their elevators. They did find, to the satisfaction of their own conceited minds, that the only wrong, or fraud perpetrated in the wheat business, was by the dishonest farmer, who was ever ready to take advantage of their honest and innocent agents.

In the meeting held here on Thursday, I charged the elevator companies with having sent orders to their agents at certain points along the line, not to grade any more wheat as "No. 1 hard" until further orders. Mr. Pillsbury denied the charge and challenged a single case to be cited. I cited the case of their agent at Manvel, who stated to two or more witnesses that he could not grade any wheat, however good, as "No. 1 hard," as he had received orders to that effect. He called upon their traveling inspector, Mr. Simms, to deny the charge, and what was Mr. Simms' answer? I believe the agent in this case did misconstrue his order. And what does Mr. Pillsbury say to this? His answer is characteristic of the man and their mode of evasion. "Well, that was a mistake." Yes, Mr. Editor, it is these mistakes, these errors in judgment which have caused to be stolen, over one-half million of dollars on the crop of 1883, in this valley alone. Mr. Pillsbury talks about discharging their agents wherever and whenever fraud can be proven against them, but it must be fraud against the elevators, not mistakes in weights or errors in grading against the farmer. The purpose of these kings of monopoly, as developed by the outcome of their recent trip into this country, is to whitewash their companies, by diverting attention from the main features of the abuses in operation to individual cases, where they can adopt and put forth every effort within their mighty power to disprove such individual cases by the conflicting testimony of their own agents, or by furnishing such plausible excuses as may, in a measure, pacify the indignation of the aggrieved. This is clearly the purpose of these monopolies, and I am surprised that our public men and press, to a considerable degree, have fallen into their trap by advising a hopeless, purposeless course at procuring evidence to cover specific cases of these suffered abuses. It is absurd to say or claim that these abuses are not in operation and threatening the destruction of the future prosperity of our country. It is equally inexcusable for our people to longer shut their eyes to the danger which is inevitable as a consequence of the further extension and continuance of these arrogant, grasping monopolies.

If the kings of monopoly can divert the people's attention from the true procedure for redress, they will do so with the hope to prevent and stay the present storm which now threatens their selfish interests, and which, unless so diverted, will gather in force and grandeur until, by the enactment of just laws, monopolies are brought within the bounds of legitimate business, and until our people are protected in their rights, property, and the pursuit of happiness.

Benedict Howard, County Attorney, and one of the most prominent lawyers of Clay Co., died in St. Paul on Wednesday Jan. 23d and was buried at Moorhead on Saturday Jan. 26th. Some time ago, we believe in the winter of '82-3, he slipped and fell on the ice, while skating, and sustained apparently slight injuries which, however, proved serious and last fall he was taken to St. Paul for treatment. The result was amputation of the injured leg and he was too weak to rally. He had hosts of friends in the Northwest who will sincerely mourn his early death.

PILLSBURY CHALLENGED.

An Ardoch Man Disputes His Statistics—Wants to Know Where the Nigger Nest-Hides.

To the Editor of the Grand Forks Herald.

STRABANE, Jan., 21st.—Having observed a statement made by Mr. Pillsbury that "170,000 bushels of wheat had been taken at his company's elevator at Ardoch, and of that amount 90 per cent was received from the farmers as No. 1 hard."

Now, sir, there is a "nigger in the fence" somewhere, and I would like to find him, and in order to get a chance, I will bet Mr. Pillsbury from $200 to $500 (according to the amount on hand, when he is ready,) that the above statement is untrue.

I will bet Mr. Pillsbury the above amount that more than 10 per cent of 170,000 bushels was bought as No. 1 regular No. 2 and will prove it by the affidavits of farmers who sold to his agents at Ardock, until I receive a sufficient number of names, to represent more than ten per cent of 17,000; said affidavits to prove that the farmers signing them, received No. 1 regular, No. 2 and 3.

I also ask permission when I have the affidavits, to examine the books at Ardock, and St. Paul, that I may be able to find the "nigger." Money and articles to be placed in Geo. B. Winship's hands. Yours Respectfully,

ED. MILLER.

Where such a state of affairs as this exists, it could not be otherwise than that grave abuses in the matter of ridiculously low prices and unjust grades should creep in. Having absolute power for good or evil, it would not be in human nature not to use it to personal advantage. It is claimed, with every appearance of truth, that the result of this system is to enable buyers to deduct at least five cents per bushel from what would be on fair principles the market price of the entire crop of the section: and this margin does not cover any necessary charges, but is a pure extortion. A computation made on the most liberal basis for the buyers allows them four cents per bushel for elevator charges, enough to pay schedule freight rates to Minneapolis—and it is permissible to doubt whether the full amount is actually charged—and yet leaves this excess of five cents per bushel between the local price and the Minneapolis price, which is simply subtracted from the farmer's returns and added to the profits of the buying association. Those who would submit quietly to such outrage must be either more or less than men. The lowering of grades below those prevailing in Eastern markets is admitted, and changes of policy leave the farmer in doubt whether a good quality of wheat will or will not command a good price, he generally being generally left in the lurch, however the decision runs. A more wretched, unjust, and extortionate practice than that described by our correspondent it would be hard to imagine; and probably in no other portion of this country is any class of people subjected to such miserable oppression, exercised by a power to which there is no resistance to be offered, and from whose dominion there is no escape, as that under which these farmers labor in their honest endeavor to provide for their families, and lay the foundations of future prosperity for themselves and for the state. As to the effect, there is but one voice. Buyers outside of the association complain loudly that they cannot compete with the users of transit, except at the pleasure of the latter; and then their competition is so limited as to be of no particular advantage to the producer. The railroad company is inexorable, and will not allow any second elevator to be built at any point unless of a capacity equal to the one already erected, nor will it accept wheat for shipment without the transit restriction. The monopoly seems to be absolutely safe from intrusion, save at its own pleasure. Farmers say that their ruin is being wrought, and prove it by getting out of the country as speedily as possible. Business men declare that the policy is having fatal results; and while the present depression must be credited in part to the stagnation that rules over the whole country, and to the low price of wheat in all markets, still a farther dockage of five cents per bushel is not calculated to cast a beam of light upon the farmer's path. That the ultimate effect of such a policy, if continued, will be to ruin industry and to put back the development of the country a decade, is an obvious conclusion. The powers that join hands in enforcing and perpetuating an odious system are doing their best to make their tributary territory worthless, and to cut themselves off from future revenue. Under such a policy no country can ever be developed, none can be kept from retrogression. But the present question is whether there may not be a remedy to be applied before affairs get into such evil case as to force the farmer to give up in, despair.

Certain it is that such an issue as this of the farmer's grievance has now become will never be allowed to pass in silence. It would be a libel upon the people to imagine that they will suffer wrongs like these to exist without remonstrance or without redress. And from every section comes the the same demand—an open market, free competition, and standard grades. It is no boon for which the farmer asks, but simply the one condition which is the breath of life to every other industry—freedom to sell his products in any market that he may choose; freedom of access to those who constitute that market. The strangeness of it is that a condition of things should have been permitted to come about by which he is practically debarred from this primary right of all industry. A correspondent who writes from Albert Lea states with commendable succinctness the leading principles of the reform which is so imperatively demanded by such facts as have been revealed. First, an independent elevator system, the elevators being operated by the railway company—or, if by others, such parties to have no connection with the buying and selling of grain. Then fixed grades, according to the system of inspection prevailing in Chicago and Milwaukee, and fixed uniform charges for receiving, storing and loading grain. Finally, freedom to sell the grain so stored on warehouse receipt, or to ship it at pleasure, all parties having equal facilities in the transaction. This is but the policy of reason. If the present buyers claim that they are doing the farmer justice, they can surely have no objection to an open market, under [illegible] plan he could receive no more. And if it be assumed that it would lower the prices now received for grain, the farmer will probably reply grimly that he will take all the risk. This is only placing him on the same vantage ground [illegible] This is [illegible] up in the expression "uniform grading" and an open market," which we have already declared to be the most promising measure of relief. If the farmer has heretofore had reason to ask it as a concession to his hatred of even the appearance of monopoly, the revelation of practices extant enables him to demand it as a right. And who will dare oppose or deny it?

PILLSBURY PINNED.

Mr. C. A. Pillsbury in the Pioneer Press of the 21st inst, says:

There was a man at Crookston who said he had been docked fourteen pounds to the bushel at our Angus elevator. But he acknowledged at Crookston—a very important thing which seems not to have been stated to your correspondent—that he had made his complaint at Minneapolis, and it had been settled long before the Crookston meeting, and before there was any agitation. But I must say further about this transaction that the agent at Angus had worked for us only about a week when the elevator burned and the wheat should have been docked fourteen pounds, I have seen wheat that ought to have been so docked and more too. But as the farmer thought he had been wronged and the wheat was burned and no way of testing it, we took his word and paid his claim It looks like straining the thing a little to bring this up as a case of injustice.

Mr. S. M. Palmer is the man referred to by Mr. Pillsbury and the following is his reply:

STATE OF MINNESOTA, } ss.
COUNTY OF POLK.

James M. Palmer being duly sworn says that he is a farmer residing near Angus, said county, that during the season of 1883 he raised a crop of wheat on his farm in Sec. 20, T. 163, R. 47, in the town of Angus, that on or about Oct. 1st, 1883, he delivered eight hundred bushels of wheat to Pillsbury & Hulbert's Elevator at Angus Station, which wheat was taken from the threshing machine and delivered to said elevator and was graded by the agent of said elevator No. 2 hard, after docking the same fourteen (14) pounds to the bushel. Affiant further says that the same quality of wheat in the same condition as delivered to said elevator, was by him loaded into a car and shipped to Duluth, Minnesota, where the same was returned to affiant as graded No. 1 hard and only docked one-half pound to the bushel for cleaning. That soon after the delivery of said wheat to said elevator at Angus the said elevator, with all the wheat, was destroyed by fire. That affiant at the time of said delivery objected to such heavy dockage as 14 pounds to the bushel, but got no satisfaction.

That on the 9th day of January, A. D. 1884, affiant appeared in the City Hall in the city of Crookston, at the meeting then being held there, at which was present A. Manvel, General Manager of the St. P., M. & M. Ry., Charles A. Pillsbury, C. S. Hulbert and others, that affiant then and there publicly stated the facts in regard to said excessive dockage on said wheat delivered to the elevator of Pillsbury & Hulbert at Angus, Minnesota. Affiant further says that his attention has been called to a letter over the signature of Charles A. Pillsbury, dated Minneapolis, Jan. 19th, and appearing in the daily Pioneer Press for Monday, January 21st, 1884. That affiant has read said letter, and affiant further says he is the person referred to therein as having been docked 14 pounds to the bushel, and that affiant never acknowledged he had made a complaint in said matter at Minneapolis, and that the same had been settled. Affiant says that said statement in said letter of Mr. Charles A. Pillsbury aforesaid is false and untrue, and that affiant has never been settled with as to dockage. Affiant further says that by reason of the unjust and groundless dockage by the Pillsbury & Hulbert Elevator at Angus Minnesota, as aforesaid, Affiant has been injured and damaged and defrauded out of about two hundred and thirty-nine dollars, which has never been settled, compromised or paid to him by Pillsbury & Hulbert or any one else, and still remains unpaid, unsettled and uncompromised, and as affiant believes justly due to affiant.

The Railway's Responsibility.

To the Editor of the Herald.

From your report of the proceedings of the meeting of the railroad and elevator magnates I see that Mr. Manvel utterly refuses to amend his agreement with the elevators, so that small buyers or individuals would be allowed to ship wheat in bulk along his road. He says that the reason why he created the 30,000 bushel capacity monopoly, was that the crop could not have been handled otherwise. Now this season showed in many places that the existing elevators could not handle the crop. Why then pursue a dog in the manger policy, and still refuse small buyers to enter the field? His road would not loos enything, as they carry the grain any way, and P. & H. stated that they get more wheat than they want. Let Mr. Manvel grant the public now to enter the market in whatever shape they like, as buyers, and the Gordian knot is cut as effectually as it can be, as long as we have only one railroad, but then the public would be satisfied. His remarks, with regard to individuals or small buyers not being able, in case of storms, to load their cars ordered and thus causing a loss to the railroad company, are not much to the point, since such a thing will not happen when people know that they have to pay three dollars per day damages. Yours Truly, FAIR PLAY.
